Perfect Time Keeper

By BILL SHARPE in State Magazine
Wonder why your $4 electric clock keeps time better than your $100 watch? It's because it is geared inflexibly to the greatest frequency in America — the 60 cycle frequency which is standard for most American power companies.

Every electric clock in eastern America is linked to a gigantic time network, and all of them, regardless of their cheapness, age or condition, move at precisely the same pace, and, barring power interruptions, every clock will always show precisely the same time as every other providing they are all pre-set to the same time.

What's A Cycle?
A cycle is a complete series of events starting from and returning to the original state. When a turbine revolves and generates alternating current, the current flows first in one direction and then in the opposite direction, varying in each direction and from zero to a maximum intensity and then back to zero. This complete series of events is one cycle, and most American systems it is repeated at a frequency of 60 times a second.

To interchange power, it is necessary that the frequency of all connected turbines be the same. The tiny synchronous motor in your electric clock, fragile as it may seem, actually is connected, through the mysterious thread of electricity, to all the hundreds of turbines in eastern America, and it spins with them as helplessly and obediently as a captive moon spins around the earth. This little motor, too, revolves at the rate of 3600 revolutions per minute. Gears in the clock reduce this revolution on your second hand to one revolution per minute, and the minute and hour hands move accordingly.

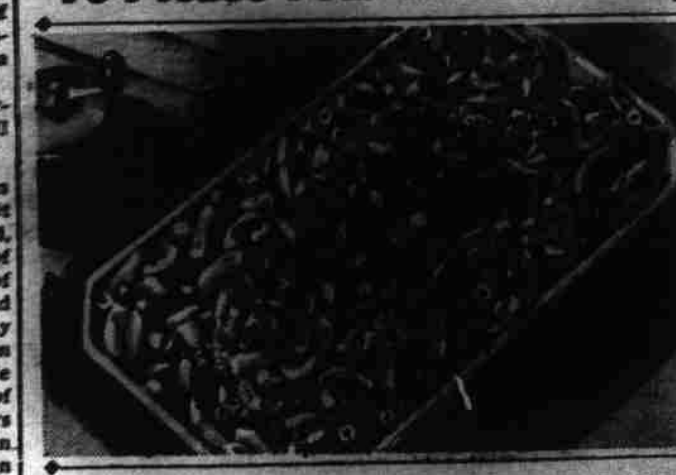

Corrects Time
It is, however, possible for a generating plant to wander fractionally from the 60-cycle norm, and when this happens, all the interlinking plants help maintain the proper time, because of their correcting influence on the other systems. When there is any deviation from the 60-cycle frequency, your clock will lose or gain a fraction of a second, but this time is made up as the system adjusts itself. In other words, your clock might be a tenth of a second slow at 10 o'clock, but will be back on time at 11, and over a period of a day the variations are wiped out.

The time-keeper for this network is a master clock in a large power plant near Zanesville, Ohio, which constantly is checked by Naval Observatory time, and which regulates the speed of the plant's generators.

Individual Clocks
Individual systems also have master clocks for regulation of frequency. Carolina Power & Light Company has such a clock at its Tillery plant, and similar clocks are being installed in the Lumberton and Cape Fear plants. When any company temporarily breaks off its connection with the great time-keeping system, its own clocks fill the
