Theodore Boykins

Scott Glenn Glenn, a chemist, testified that blood stains on the defendant's coat and Mrs. Barnes' blouse were type A. Glenn also testified that seminal stains on both the defendant's and victim's clothing were found.

SBI Agent John Boyd, a ballistics expert, testified that the bullets found at the murder scene were fired from a .38 caliber pistol, which was identified as a weapon which Boykins had left in the car of Henry Wiggins, a Wallace Negro, Wiggins later found the pistol and turned it over to Deputy Snyder Dempsey.

Defense attorneys Rivers Johnson, Jr. and Tommy Gresham presented arguments to the jury indicating that the confession of Boykins had been acquired under duress and threats and that he was searched illegally.

Solicitor Walter Britt and Hubert Phillips, who assisted Britt in the prosecution for the State, argued before the jury that Boykins should be removed from society and asked that the jury not show mercy. Solicitor Britt said Boykins was a brute and likened him to an animal with a killing instinct.

After Judge Fountain charged the jury, the jury stayed out one hour and 15 minutes before returning the guilty verdict.

Hot Weather Is Just Ahead - Dairy Cows Should Be Kept Cool In Summer

This is the time of year when dairymen should be considering management procedures for hot weather. These have shown that comfort for cows in hot weather may be as important as proper feeding for maximum production.

It is not unusual for milk production to drop as much as 30 per cent during hot weather, according to Gay S. Parsons, extension dairy specialist at North Carolina State College. High humidity, along with high temperature, affects the cows even more than when the humidity is low.

Hot weather not only lowers the volume of milk, but it also lowers the percentage of fat and solids-not-fat in the milk.

The initial high temperature for dairy cows is 75-80 degrees. When the temperature goes above this level, feed consumption, body weight and milk yields decline. This is due to the fact that cows have to reduce their roughage intake to provide cooling.

Dairymen cannot do anything about the weather, Parsons said, but they can provide a little more comfort for their dairy cows. If you do not have plenty of natural shade, for example, building a pole-type shelter open on all sides will protect cows from the summer heat. It should be located where there is good air movement. A simple, inexpensive shelter will do the job and give a good return on the investment.

Another important thing that a cow needs is to maintain high production in the summer months. This is adequate feed. Research work has shown that during hot weather it is desirable to reduce the fiber content of the ration by feeding high-quality roughage in reduced amounts and increasing concentrates high in energy. Give the cows the best pasture at night when they will do most of their grazing or provide for heavy feeding of roughages at night, since the temperatures are lower and the cows will eat better.

In addition to providing adequate shade and feed, it is also necessary to provide for a large quantity of good, clean, fresh water at all times.
