With The Duplin Circuit Rider

We have lived and ridden the Duplin Circuit for two years and we have sought to be witnesses for Christ. We came in His name and have been grateful to you for the many acts of kindness which have been extended towards us. Duplin has in times past done its share. May the people of Duplin be even greater in the service of God, County, State and Nation in the future than they have been in the past.

Go to Church and learn about true patriotism in the service of God and Country.

Church School at 10:00 A. M. in Kenansville, Magnolia and Un-ty Churches.

National Attention

The station is an integral part of the teaching, research, and extension responsibilities of the School of Agriculture of North Carolina State College in Raleigh.

The scientists' research projects are as varied as the State's agricultural needs from which they spring. An economist, for example, may work on a cheaper method of loading broilers. An entomologist develops a new program to control cotton insects. An agricultural engineer works on machines for growers of tobacco. An agronomist studies the needs of apple trees for boron. A poultry nutritionist charts the relationship between vitamins and fowl typhoid. Plant breeders release a continuous stream of new and better varieties of crops. Geneticists, bacteriologists, and biochemists delve into the secrets of life. Rural sociologists and home economists study the needs of farm families. Far from his laboratories at State College, a plant breeder searches the Andes for wild and cultivated peanut plants. A station geneticist scours islands of the Caribbean for wild cottons. Back home, a plant pathologist screens a collection of wild tobaccos from all over the world in the hope of finding a trait that can be used in a program to breed better tobacco. Whatever the specialty, the goal is always the same: To push back the horizons of agriculture.

Much of the work is done at branch stations. Anyone who travels south along U. S. Route 117 realizes he is in a distinct farming area as he nears Wilmington, N. C. Light, sandy soil gives way to darker earth. Fields of corn and tobacco give way to fields of lettuce, beans, strawberries, gladioli, and iris. Near the center of this rich vegetable and flower-growing area are greenhouses and hundreds of plant-filled research plots of the Horticultural Crops Research Station. Fifty miles to the west is another distinct agricultural area, the Border Tobacco Belt. Here also is a branch station. There are 14 others; they test in the field under rigorous farmlike conditions the ideas that are born in State College laboratories and are nurtured in college greenhouses. In a State of many different agricultural and geographic conditions, the branch stations are important. Growing conditions at Waynesville, for example, may be more like growing conditions in Maine than those in the North Carolina Sandhills, only 200 miles to the east. Furthermore, branch stations are the windows of the scientists' laboratories, through which a tobacco grower can see a promising new variety, or a swine producer can look at a new kind of farrowing house. After all, the scientists' work is not done until their knowledge is given to people who can use it.

Cooperation is the keynote of the entire research effort. Farmers cooperate by volunteering to test new techniques in their fields on a scale that is bigger and more practical than is possible in a laboratory but is just as precise and carefully planned. The North Carolina Department of Agriculture cooperates by providing staff workers and some facilities. Station scientists provide technical information for the department's regulatory officials. The officials, in return, advise the scientists on research needs uncovered in the field. Station and department workers cooperate closely in the State Soil Testing Laboratory and in the State's animal disease diagnostic laboratories. The United States Department of Agriculture cooperates by supporting projects that could have value beyond the borders of North Carolina.

Two years after the station was established, Albert R. Ledoux, the first director, wrote: "Thus we were able to offer to the farmers of the State complete and free protection against frauds in commercial fertilizers. . . . Dr. R. L. Lovvorn, the present director, can write today with equal confidence: "Thus we were able to offer to farmers of the State a tobacco crop" - a crop worth 500 million dollars to them annually. On two occasions, station scientists have developed resistant varieties in time for Tar heel farmers to roll back fatal diseases that threatened their tobacco. Such accomplishments still occur, but usually it is the multitude of diverse, and often seemingly small, research findings that raise continuously the efficiency of agriculture in North Carolina.

For the first 60 years, work of the experiment station was supported by the United States Department of Agriculture with some allocations from the North Carolina Department of Agriculture. Since 1937, however, the North Carolina General Assembly has been making larger and larger direct appropriations. The State now provides nearly half of the station's budget of 2 million dollars. National foundations provide 900 thousand dollars more. Farmers make a contribution by assessing themselves 5 cents on each ton of feed and fertilizer they buy. They call it their "Nickles-for-Know-How" program. Scientists at the North Carolina Agricultural Experiment Station call it a continuing testament to the faith that farmers have placed in their research.
