SENATOR ERYN SAYS

WASHINGTON — The Senate passed the Farm Bill on May 25th after a five day debate. The vote was 42-38. I voted for the bill which now goes to the House for its action. Prior to final passage I voted for the Ellender amendments which provide marketing quotas for feed grains and wheat, but I voted to delete Title I which provides among other things for diversion of farm land to recreational uses. Simply stated this year's Senate bill has attempted to realistically meet the farmer, but at the same time to save the taxpayers of the nation about $500,000,000 a year on the cost of farm programs. Marketing surpluses of wheat and feed grains have impeded the farm program. The Senate bill attempts to cope with this situation.

SENATE VERSION — The original farm bill (S. 2788) as sponsored by the Administration was submitted to the Senate on January 31. In brief, it attempted to balance supply and demand by the establishment of programs for feed grains, wheat, milk, turkeys, and turkey hatching eggs. It also contained a number of other provisions including the retirement of surplus cropland by diverting it to recreation and wildlife uses, and the expansion of the Food for Peace program. During hearings and committee action, the Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee deleted the dairy and turkey controls proposals, revised the wheat and feed grains proposals, and reported out a new bill (S. 3253). Senator Ellender, Chairman of the Committee, in the course of the debate on the Senate bill offered amendments which restored in large measure the wheat and feed grains sections of the original bill. These were incorporated in the final Senate bill. In substance, farmers are offered a choice under the wheat provision of a supply-management program which calls for high supports and strict production and marketing controls, it accepted by a referendum, or approximately a free-market with-out high supports for wheat, if rejected by a referendum. The feed grains provision seeks to establish marketing quotas for the price-supported corn, grain sorghums, and barley, subject also to a producer referendum. Hereafter, feed grains have had price supports, but not controls.

CHANGES — The basic change in the wheat program under the Senate farm bill is that it imposes allotments on the basis of bushels rather than acreage, as heretofore. When the wheat marketing program was enacted in 1938, a 55 million national minimum acreage was established. Since that time the production of wheat per acre has nearly doubled due to technological advances. The new national marketing quota would have a minimum allotment of 1 billion bushels per year. Producers receiving acreage allotments of less than 15 acres would still be exempt from marketing quotas if they so desired. They would be allowed to plant only up to their small farm base acreage or 15 acres, whichever was less.

The feed grains provision of the bill would establish for the first time marketing quotas subject to acceptance by a producer referendum, whenever supplies were excessive for corn, grain sorghums and barley, beginning with the 1963 crop. The referendum would cover a one, two, or three year period as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. The minimum national quota for any year would be 11 billion tons. Producers receiving an acreage allotment of less than 25 acres could elect to be exempt from marketing quotas, but could plant only up to their farm base acreage or 25 acres, whichever was less.

The 1962 Farm Bill represents a sincere attempt to adjust the farm program to meet current conditions. By its very nature, there can be no permanent or perfect solution to govern agriculture's many and complex problems.
