We Do Have Birthdays

An institution, like the individual, has birthdays—events celebrated in a spirit of happiness and hope for the future. In a certain sense, while the individual becomes older, the institution becomes younger, since it must function in the spirit and manner of must function in the spirit and manner of the age in which it lives. So, while the Cooleeemee Journal is proud of its past, and tries to preserve the best of it, we feel like kicking up our heels in the manner and spirit of contemporary life—which is to say, we feel somewhat youngish, and while waltz is our favorite dance, we are not averse to swinging a bit with teenagers on our 59th birthday.

We are not unmindful of the past and the memory thereof, we must confess, fills us with nostalgia. They were good days in spite of the hardships. At least, we like to recall that one could buy a pound of coffee for ten cents, and a penny would buy a big stick of candy. When the Journal was born one could go to a store with five dollars and return laden with goods; today, we can bring it home in our coat pockets — with room to spare.

We are all for the progress of our generation. Scientific knowledge has created many things to enlarge and enrich human life; but in its increase of things, the world has forgotten to carry along some more ethical, and spiritual elements in life which leaves us at the mercy of things minus the qualities which make for justice, righteousness and peace. Our things are becoming increasingly given to implements of destruction, and we stand before life today appalled, frightened and fearful of what might happen any day. Somewhere along the line we missed several boats which might have carried us to a safer and happier destination.

We wish that we could go back and bring back a few items in the past—such as the neighborliness, friendliness, honest dealings, and the reverence for life which we held in the days of simple living.

So, while we celebrate a birthday, we do so with a thankfulness of our past, the joys and benefits of the present, and gratefulness to our subscribers, advertisers, and readers. We aim to give the best spirit of the past to infuse the present with all of its neighborliness, friendliness, and regard for life: Trusting that such a spirit may make our many things in scientific achievements, serve the best and highest purposes of life.

We celebrate in happy mood and hope—though in a world somewhat confused.
