BILL CURRIE

Mouth of the South

Baptist Bottom

Anyone who has met and listened even briefly to Cal Stoll knows that the Wake Forest football team is being tutored by a man of exceptional personality and ultimate dedication.

He is the latest, and possibly the last, in a line of men holding impressive credentials, and who have guzzled the gall of defeat with appalling consistency. Stoll has not been able to win in his brief tenure at Baptist Bottom, and the likelihood is that he never will.

Bill Tate could not. Paul Amen achieved only modest success. Billy Hildebrand bombed out in flames, and Tom Rogers almost went off the end of his limb in frustration. Only Peahead Walker could win at Wake Forest, and that was a long time ago.

There are many reasons why a winning football team is not compatible with the Deacon athletic program. First, and overwhelmingly so, is the money problem. Wake Forest, with all its academic excellence, and its rich traditions, is with other institutions of similar constitution, simply unable to finance big time winning football.

Small Crowds, Donations

The crowds are not big enough, and the alumni donations fall short. In a gasping effort to overcome these shortcomings, the Deacons schedule behemoths of the gridiron who are able to recruit, feed and educate many more ball players, and are correspondingly stronger.

The outcome of the overscheduling is to keep the coffers just above the panic level, but to lose many games, and often injure key players.

It is very like being caught in a two-way suction. Leave off the Nebraskas and the Florida States and you won't have enough money to operate. Play 'em and get your brains beat out.

Of course, Wake Forest suffers from the same Atlantic Coast Conference rules as to athletic grants-in-aid which plague the other members of the league. In the case of the Deacons, however, the problem is magnified in the light of the money difficulties.

By nature a coach must be a man of eternal optimism. If he did not believe he could win doubtless he would slash his throat or hurl himself into some fate worse than death such as selling cemetery plots or magazines door to door. The failure of one coach or a dozen does not deter some other man from rushing into an impossible breach with his head and colors up.

Assistants Eye Jobs

All assistant coaches worth their salt eye a head job with slavering desire. When a guy gets in his middle years, teetering about on the precipice of forty, he really begins to get desperate. He will accept a head job in a place unlikely to win because he believes he can do it. All he needs is a chance.

So as great as Cal Stoll is as a person, and as hard as he works as a coach, the losses which he is suffering were predictable, and the future holds little promise of improvement. What then is the future for Wake Forest football?

In time, as unpalatable as it may be to the Deacon alumni and students, in all probaility Wake Forest along with Furman, VMI, and countless other small, privately endowed schools, will quit. Many excellent collegiate athletic programs are running deep in the black all over the country without football black all over the country without football.

Emphasis on basketball will bring national prestige and favorable press from sea to sea at a fraction of the cost of football. What's more, in the years ahead, only the heartiest of the college football teams will keep the public interest. The pro game has grown into a formidable monster.

Frankly I long for the good old days when college football ruled the roost and Wake Forest had as good a chance to get a player as anybody. But these days are gone, and with them went the possibility of any coach, regardless of his ability or dedication, to win at Baptist Bottom.

Munday's touchdown run went for 14-yards in the second quarter, and Beaver added the two-point conversion, but the Raiders tied the score on a pass and a two-point run.
