Many solutions have been of high cost of living from time to while do we say. time. The tariff, our curretcy out into cold figures. The follmost always the things we ought lowing computation shows how grabhically why the penny is so elusive. Here a perfectly good Lincoln penny is made to obliterate itself by the simple restate ment of a proposition. Two boys have 60 apples which they divide The first sells 30 at 3 for 1 cent The second sells his 30 at 2 for 1 cent. The first gets 10 cents and the second 15 cents. Their total for selling 60 apples at 5 for 2 cent is 25 cents. Another boy has 60 apples and sells them for 5 for 2 cents and receives only 24 cents. The question is, what becomes of the other cent. In both instances the number of apples sold for 2 cents is the same yet the total amount differs by 1 cent. Why? When you can solve this question to the satisfaction of yourself and friends you may nominate yourself as a member of the committee to solve the high cost of living.

MONKEY HAS LITTLE BRAIN

Keeper, After Many Years of Associa-tion With Them, Fully Conversant of Their Limitations.

The recent death of George Mansbridge, head keeper of the apes and menkeys at the London see, has led to the publication of his views regarding our neavest animal kin-obviously the views of an expert, as he had spent thirty-four years with the 200 monkeys. Mansbridge was more or less well known to scientists through his association with the late Professor Romanes during the latter's efforts to get some new light on the mental equipment of apes. They succeeded in teaching one of Mansbridge's charges to count up to five, without the use of any trick sign. They also educated the same animal so that she could tell the difference between white and any other color, but beyond this distinction her color sense did not go. Mansbridge himself taught his apes many simple tricks. One of the most striking of these was the feeding of one orang by another. Although these animals are very greedy, one of them, when handed a cup of milk and a spoon, and told to feed his sister, would do so until the keeper gave him permission to help himself. Mansbridge was unusually successful in handling his monkeys, could do very much as he liked with the younger ones. He believed, however, that as they grew older their nature changed and they besame treacherous and dangerous. He had comparatively little control of his grown-up spes, and admitted his fear of the two large orange in the In Jest and in Earnes!
