FRIDAY JULY 21, 1922

An Unwelcomed Guest Has Arrived.

The boll weevil has made its appearance in Pitt county and unless the farmers take the offensive the pest will so, strongly entrenched by next year that crops will suffer inestimably. We have heard much about the weevil in past years, and know it would reach us after a while, but very few farmers have thought over the matter seriously.

The time has come, however, for serious consideration, and the grower that expects to raise his usual crop next year must prepare himself. The use of arsenate is considered the most effective way of combating the pest. It has been used extensively in all areas visited by the weevil with pronounced success.

In fact, farm demonstration agents have investigated the best means of decreasing the ravages and have found to their own satisfaction that arsenate destroys the weevil more effectively than all other things combined. Stricken districts have used the powder to a direct advantage in past months, and as a result crop destruction isn't near so bad as two years ago when great havoc was wrought in hundreds of cotton producing communities.

The weevil multiplies rapidly. One weevil can create a million in comparative short time and at this rate fields can be covered by the pest in startlingly short time. The farmer's work will be greatly increased by employing these measures but they will find they have gained more than can possibly be lost.

Some people seem to think the danger of the weevil is exaggerated.

That is a mistake, as extensive reading of authoritative literature will show, will find the job a big one and the pest as serious as the worst picture ever painted it. So the thing to do is to prepare for eventualities.
