Call Broody Hens From Laying Flock

Hens that show signs of broodiness should usually be culled from the laying flock.

Prof. E. S. Dearstyn, head of the poultry department at State College, in making this recommendation points out that although a great deal of progress has been made in reducing broodiness in laying birds, this trait still appears in some chickens, especially in the American breeds.

Because of the frequency of its appearance, the question often arises as to whether or not broody hens are profitable and whether they should be culled from laying flocks.

If a high intensity of lay has been bred into the birds, they may have periods of broodiness and still lay profitably, he says. However, from an over-all standpoint in most cases, it would be advantageous to cull such birds from the flock.

As a rule, one period of broodiness is usually followed with another, and breaking hens from broodiness requires a great deal of time—more than most poultrymen have to spare.

Furthermore, Dearstyn says, if birds that show signs of broodiness are used to produce hatching eggs, it is highly probable that the tendency to broodiness will appear in their progeny.

Christmas Card Etiquette: It is best form to address one Christmas card to a husband and wife, separate cards to individuals, members of the family. If only one card is sent to a household, however, it is proper to honor each member by writing the names separately on the envelope. In other words, DON'T EVER write "and family" on an envelope.
