BIRD CLUB NOTES

Jimmie Joyner read an article Saturday at the Bird club on the Redpoll whose home is in the Northland where it rears a family in quite a business-like way in trees or bushes. After this accomplishment, it joins others of its own kind for a vacation and is rarely seen except in flocks of 20 to 50. Sometimes 200 or 300 compose a flock. While on this winter tour the Redpolls visit and mingle with their cousins, the Crossbills and the Goldfinches.

When at home the Redpoll has little time for singing, but with the throwing off of family responsibility it proves how sweet it can sing.

Not at all suspicious, this five and one-half inch bird will allow a person to approach very closely without becoming alarmed.

Its bright poppy-red crown is a contrast to the upper parts of dark grayish brown streaked with darker gray and grayish white. The cheeks, lower throat, chest and sides of breast are deep peach blossom pink; the under parts are white. Although similar to the male, the female has no pink coloring. No red is found on the crown of the young.

Two to five eggs are laid in a bulky nest constructed of loosely woven twigs and grasses and warmly lined with feathers.

At the meeting May 3, Paschall Barrett read the article.

The average American male, says one anthropologist, is five feet ten, weighs 150 pounds, is 29 inches around the waist, has sixteen teeth and scanty hair. He tends to be portly as he gets older. However, with all his short-comings, he is the biggest and healthiest man in the world. One reason is that he gets the best food.
