No Reduction Seen In Prices Of Feeds All hope for cheap livestock and poultry feeds in the ensuing year has vanished, according to Assistant Agriculture Commissioner D. S. Coltrane. Feed will be "somewhat hard to get" and prices will be high, he reported.

Producers of beef, pork, milk, eggs and poultry are confronted, Coltrane said, "with the now all-too-familiar task of trying to make profits with high-priced feed. The situation may force rather heavy liquidation of livestock and poultry, which may in turn cause even higher prices for these products later."

"Our farmers should buy feed only as needed. A late fall would improve the outlook. Farmers should save all the hay they can and sow a big small grain crop this year."

"Milk producers will suffer from the squeeze of high feed prices and consumer resistance to higher milk prices."

In discussing the livestock feed outlook for 1947-48, Coltrane said: "If we were not a feed deficit state we would be all right because our local feed production looks very good."

"And that girl in there, my daughter, is just one generation removed from the pioneers who settled the plains of Oklahoma last century. My father had a 360-acre claim, and on it he raised his family and traded with the Indians, and he was the first to introduce trees and shrubs to the flat, treeless, and shrubless prairies of Oklahoma."

It was in Oklahoma that Mrs. Meade got her start on the stage, in church and school affairs at the age of eight. She attended school in Texas, then went to New York to prepare for the theatre.

Her daughter, Julia, was born in Boston. She entered Yale three years ago, acted in summer stock and this spring completed her drama studies. Like her mother she is tall, blue-eyed and fair, with auburn hair that cascades to her shoulders, and her voice has the clarity of a bell in the large, open-air amphitheatre.

Director Samuel Selden chose her from among a dozen or more applicants for the part of Virginia Dare's mother when it came time to cast "The Lost Colony" for its tenth anniversary season in the Waterside theatre at Fort Raleigh. After the 49-performance summer ends on Labor Day, she will return to New York, where she has lived most of her life, and sometime in the fall there awaits her a screen test with Warner Brothers.

Now, sitting in the wings, her mother watches with a mixture of professional concern and maternal pride as Julia bows before Queen Elizabeth. And Mrs. Meade prides "The Lost Colony" in terms so extravagant that even a press agent would hesitate to use them.

"Brander Matthews of Columbia," she recalls, "referred to the drama as the five fingers of a hand, the fingers being sculpture, painting, dance, music and drama itself, and the perfect work of art, he said, fused them all in perfect proportion. Here you have such a fusion. You have them all here in one play, and you have them in perfect proportion, in perfect harmony, one with all the others."

"And the story itself—the mystery of what happened to the colonists who came here with their dream of freedom and opportunity, then vanished, their dream being realized in another place and another time—it all makes perfect drama."

"The play is lucky, too, in the people who make it, the actors who come here, and the people of Roanoke Island—they themselves are just as important as the others, and they've done their own kind of pioneering right here and now, in making this play possible. Yes, it's a great play."

The scene ends. Queen Elizabeth rises and sweeps to her exit. Mrs. Meade stands to greet Julia, and then they sit in the wings, talking quietly in the shadows until Julia must go on again.
