GOOD NEWS FOR THE YOUNGSTERS

(The Kansas City Star)

Spanking is no longer accepted in all quarters as a proper aid to child-rearing. Specialists in the field now children can be easily overdone. They agree that physical punishment of urge a reasoning approach when possible or, if not, some other means of nonphysical correction for misconduct. Use of the switch is advised only in extreme cases, such as to impress youngsters with the seriousness of running into the streets or otherwise risking their lives.

Concern for the health and general welfare of extreme youth has led to this conclusion by the child experts. But many parents, it appears, aren't ready to accept their judgment. For two speakers at the first Pan-American Congress of Pediatrics recently reported that paddling still is being practiced generally. They say it's popular because "Spanking requires the least brains on the part of papa and mama."

If this explanation ever gets passed around widely among the younger set, look for a revolutionary result. Instead of pleading not to be paddled because "it hurts," the kiddies will be imploring parents bent on punishment to "Use your heads, not your hands."

This shaming challenge should bring ever so many mothers and fathers around to the considered viewpoint of the child specialists. It should, but we wouldn't care to make a bet that it will.
