CAMP MACKALL CHANGES FROM GHOST TO BUSY POST OF 2000

In less than one month Camp Mackall, North Carolina, located 15 miles south of Southern Pines along U. S. No. 1 has been transformed from an abandoned ghost camp—a relic of World War II—into a bustling Army post already housing more than 2,000 troops. These men have arrived from all over the Eastern United States to participate in the Joint Army-Air Force training - Exercise SOUTHERN PINE during August.

During this short period, a well stocked post exchange, together with an open air tavern has been put into operation, the theatre has been repaired and now is handling first run films, and the service club is ready to reopen after extensive reconstruction.

One end of Big Muddy Lake has been cleared for swimming, life guards have been appointed and attendance is high.

Work on these and other more technical projects such as roads, plumbing, lighting and communications was in large measure accomplished by units attached to the Aggressor Service Command, headed by Colonel Donald P. Wylie, of Patterson, New Jersey.

Camp Mackall is Aggressor Headquarters for the Maneuver, and the Aggressor Service Command, or AGSCOM, is the agency which will coordinate the activities of the service troops required by the Aggressor tactical forces. Officers and men of this Headquarters are from Major General Crump Garvin's, 301st Logistical Command, previously located at Camp Rucker, Alabama.

Rehabilitation of Camp Mackall is already more complete than it was for any of the previous maneuvers since the end of World War II. While PX sales began in a tent three hours after the first troops had arrived here, within a week the Exchange had moved to a permanent building and men from the 50th Medical Clearing Company had begun work on the outdoor tavern, priority project of Captain Frank L. Mullen of Monroe, Louisiana, Army Exchange Officer.

Theatre seats were requisitioned from another post and for the first time since early last year a full length Hollywood film was shown indoors when the theatre had its grand opening the evening of June 20th. Performers from the 300th Special Service Company provided live entertainment at the opening, master of ceremonies at which was Master Sergeant Richard T. Nolan, theatre manager.

One of the busiest units in the rehabilitation was C Company of the 969th Engineer Construction Battalion, also in from Camp Rucker, and commanded by Captain John F. Williams. The 969th is responsible for the quick work on the theatre, the service club, and the lake area, as well as many important but more routine projects, among them road repair, installation of refrigeration facilities and sign painting.

Among units already phased in are outfits representing the Signal, Quartermaster, Ordnance, Adjutant General, Military Police and Transportation Corps besides those already mentioned. Each unit has had its part in helping to make Camp Mackall the rejuvenated installation it is today.

The purpose of Aggressor is to add realism to the maneuver. The objective of Exercise Southern Pine will be to drive the "invaders" out of the Carolinas. Aggressor units will, of course, be made up of United States troops wearing distinctive green uniforms, crested helmets and their own peculiar insignia.

Aggressor tactical units have already begun arriving at Camp Mackall and are taking full advantage of the excellent facilities they are finding there.
