Synthetics Capture Some Farm Markets

American farmers have lost about 10 percent of their total market in recent years to synthetics or man-made products.

This estimate is reported by two economists at North Carolina State University who have recently surveyed the impact of synthetics agriculture.

The economists, Drs. Fred Mangum and Leigh H. Hammond, gave these examples of how synthetics have cut into farm markets:

-Twenty years ago, natural fibers -- mainly cotton and wool - accounted for 96 percent of the total fiber Synthetic or non agricultural fibers now account for over one-third of this fats and vegetable oils were the base for manufacturing percent of the soaps used in this country. More than 80 percent of the soaps and detergents used today are manufactured from non · agricultural raw materials.

-The use of non-agricultural sweeteners - cyclamates and about six times faster than the use of sugar. Sugar still accounts for over 90 percent of the sweetener market, however.

While synthetics can compete directly with agricultural products, they can also change the nature of the competition between various agricultural products.

For example, dacron-cotton topcoats have replaced many all-wool topcoats. In this case, dacron helped cotton while creating new competition for Soybeans are another good example. Traditionally used for animal feed, soybeans have now become the base for a host of synthetic products margarine, coffee whiteners, whipped toppings, artificial , synthetic meats, and so forth.

Hammond said that synthetics are generally less expensive than the natural products with which they are competing. They can also have special advantages.

Another distinction between agricultural and non agricultural products is the size of business which produces them. New synthetics require large amounts of money for research, development market promotion. Therefore, they are most likely to come from large firms.

Mangum believes that synthetics present a tough challenge to agricultural policy makers. Rigid price supports, set above free market levels, will encourage the development of new synthetics, he predicts. As an alternative, policy makers might want to use a more flexible pricing system, letting farm products settle to about their free market level. Direct payments could then be used to bring farm income up to the levels deemed satisfactory by society. Mangum then added:

greatest imp synthetics may be on marketing and processing firms rather than on farmers. New products could createenvironment favorable for the domination of the industry by a few firms . . . Then policies would be needed to insure that a few firms . both consumers and other producers and processors would not suffer because of
