HINT: Recycling an old garment may be a waste of time, if you do not evaluate the garment's potential first.

Recycling projects require thought, planning, and an investment of time and sewing skills. Before you tackle a major recycling project, try on your garment and study it carefully to determine its recycling potential. Ask yourself:

1. What keeps you from wearing the item of clothing now?
2. What does it need -- refitting, a change in length, a new neckline?
3. Does the garment design lend itself to restyling into a current fashion item?
4. Is the fabric worth using? Is it worn at stress points or pulling at seams?
5. Do you have the time, patience, and skills to complete the project?
6. Will this restyling save money?
7. Is it worth it? Will the final result be worth the investment of time and skill?

8. Will you enjoy the restyling project as a creative challenge?

These questions can help you evaluate your garment in light of three main factors that determine a garment's recycling potential: 1) fabric type, 2) fabric condition, and 3) garment style.

Good luck with your new challenge. If you have problems concerning those garments you would like to recycle call Anna Peele, Ass't. Home Economics Ext. Agent at 875-2162.
