Mary Eanes receives PSU graduate award

Some 100 awards were presented at Pembroke State University Tuesday as part of the University's fourth annual "Awards Day" on campus.

Each academic department presented awards, many of them being cash scholarships, plus there were awards from the Admissions Office, Student Affairs Office, military science areas, and Panhellenic areas.

Mary Eanes of Raeford was awarded the Communicative Arts Outstanding Graduate Award.

Hundreds of PSU students jammed in the present Pembroke State Student Center for the presentations which lasted over an hour. Chancellor Paul Givens, in his remarks, commented: "I hope in the future we can hold these occasions in our new student center (for which PSU is requesting $4 million in state funds)."

In congratulating the students on their achievements, Chancellor Givens said: "Our greatest compliment is to expect a great deal of you -- both as students while you are here and also when you depart from here as graduates."

Water contamination has been a worry for many centuries. Historians believe that Rome's last emperors were poisoned by lead linings in water pipes and wine jugs.

Pettitt completes Institute program

Alice Pettitt

Alice L. Pettitt, Hoke County 4-H agent, has graduated from the North Carolina Agricultural Extension's Executive Institute.

Pettitt was one of 25 students who attended 18 days of instruction over a six-month period. Along with classwork, students put much time on team case studies and individual work in home counties.

"The Institute is a leadership program for outstanding county agents," said Dr. Chester D.

Black, state extension director. "It focuses on developing those concepts, skills and values that extension workers must possess to provide dynamic and effective management and program leadership."

A native of Rocky Mount, Pettitt worked in the Wayne County extension office for six years before moving to the Hoke office in 1981. She served as vice president of the state 4-H agents' association last year.

Area students honored during ceremony

More than 100 minority students recently were honored for outstanding academic achievement at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Naima Ain Salahuddin of Raeford and Rose Marie Parish of Red Springs were among those students who were honored.

The Office of Student Counseling sponsored a ceremony and reception for the students honored and their parents. Each student honored has at least a "B" average at Carolina.

The office honors the students to increase recognition of academic accomplishments, said Dean Hayden B. Renwick, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at UNC-CH and the office's director.

"It is a terrible thing when an academic institution does not recognize academic achievement as much as it should," Renwick said. "I hope that this kind of recognition will inspire students here on campus and back at home to do well academically."

Low back pain cited

You have probably experienced bad back pains sometime or other. In fact, nearly 75 million Americans suffer varying degrees of chronic back pain. Many cases of low back pain are idiopathic (of unknown origin), resulting from bad habits and being in poor physical shape.

Protect your back. Practice good posture, use firm chairs for sitting, sleep on a hard mattress, let your legs do most of the work in lifting heavy objects, avoid high heels, and maintain your proper weight. Exercise to increase body strength. Back health is never so important as when you have lost it!
