

Announcing candidacy

Lauch Faircloth

The 56-year-old D.M. "Lauch" Faircloth is attempting to take a successful 35-year business career into the governor's office. Faircloth, who is a native of Clinton, served until this year as secretary of commerce since 1977. He is a high school graduate, tobacco farmer and business man. Faircloth has outspent all contenders in his bid for the state's highest office. Through April, his campaign had cost $1.78 million including $650,000 he had lent the effort personally. Faircloth has also served as chairman of the state highway commission. His platform is more jobs, avoid raising taxes and improved primary and secondary education.

Eddie Knox

Former Charlotte Mayor Eddie Knox is hoping his leadership and influence in the western part of the state will put him over the top in the balloting for governor. The 47-year-old Knox, has not only enlisted the help of former school Superintendent Raz Autry to help him in Hoke County, but he has also spent $1.4 million on his campaign statewide. Knox is a graduate of N.C. State University and the Wake Forest Law School. He served in the state Senate and practices law in Charlotte. Knox favors tax incentives for renovating old houses, downtown areas and historic structures. He also supports day care for businesses, improved educational facilities and improved law enforcement.

Gilmore giving race a run

Tom Gilmore, who has been actively campaigning longer than other candidates in the race for governor, is a resident of Julian and a graduate of N.C. State University. He has served in the state House and as deputy secretary of the state Department of Human Resources. The 47-year-old Gilmore is the president of Gilmore Plant and Bulb Co. Through April, his campaign had cost $272,000, but he has raised $352,000. He is the chairman of the Committee on Constitutional Integrity, a non-profit research and educational organization whose purpose is to recommend changes in policies to strengthen the North Carolina Constitution.

John Ingram

State Insurance Commissioner John R. Ingram, who hails from Cary, is hoping his efforts to keep state insurance rates low will help his campaign for governor. Ingram has spent the least of all the contenders with expenditures of $276,228. The 54-year-old is a graduate of the University of North Carolina Chapel Hill Business School and law school. He has served in the state House for one term and is serving his third term as insurance commissioner. In 1978 he was the state's Democratic Party nominee for the U.S. Senate.

Jimmy Green

At 63, Lt. Governor James C. Green is the oldest leading contender for governor. Green is completing his second term as lieutenant governor, and he has also served in the state House and Senate. He was speaker of the House in 1975-76. He attended Washington and Lee University and was a combat Marine during World War II. The Clarkton resident is a tobacco warehouse owner. Green was the target of a F.B.I. investigation recently, but was cleared of all charges. He had spent $636,000 on his campaign through April. He is for higher salaries for state employees and school personnel, including teachers, against funding abortions for the poor, economic growth, improved transportation and improved housing.
