Couple celebrates Valentine's Day in 'A Zoo Affair'

Who comes to mind when you think of famous couples? Romeo and Juliet?

At the state zoo, the choice is likely to be Ramar and Hope, the zoo's popular pair of Lowland gorillas. They've been drawing crowds since they went on exhibit when the new African Pavilion opened last October.

To celebrate Valentine's Day, the North Carolina Zoological Park is presenting "A Zoo Affair," featuring gorilla lore, romantic music and free admission to children who bring a valentine to Hope or Ramar.

Sponsored by the zoo and the N.C. Zoological Society, "A Zoo Affair" will begin Saturday, Feb. 9, and run through Sunday, Feb. 17. On weekends, volunteer guides will be stationed at the gorilla habitat to tell visitors everything they've always wanted to know about gorillas and hand out printed information and photographs of Ramar.

On Sundays, classical music will be performed at the lower entrance to the African Pavilion. Every day visitors may pick up plastic "I Love Zoo" tote bags at the ticket office.

Depending on the weather, the gorillas will be at home in their quarter-acre indoor habitat, or their half-acre outdoor habitat. They share the huge pavilion with about 150 other African animals and 3,300 exotic plants and trees.

Among the other animal species on exhibit in the 55,000-square-foot pavilion are Patas monkey, mandrill, gerenuk, Black-backed duiker, Colobus monkey, dik-dik, serval, caracal, springhaas, African hooded vulture and rock python.

The African Pavilion and African Plains, a 40-acre habitat for antelope and large, ground-dwelling birds, are the zoo's newest exhibits. Visitors also see birds from nearly every continent living among tropical plants in the walk-through R.J. Reynolds Forest Aviary. Six outdoor habitats for exotic animals such as lions, elephants and chimpanzees complete the zoo's 300-acre African section.
