Moment of recognition
Because of her many years of dedication, Mrs. Elenor Scull was recognized by parents, students, and alumni during the annual Easter program of the Raeford Kindergarten and Day Nursery. The school was given a Xerox machine through donations of many parents and alumni. Following the Easter program, an open house was held at the Kindergarten. Here Rob Leandro presents Mrs. Scull with roses as other students look on.

Depression may be biological

By Charles Blackburn
Duke Univ. Medical Center
A study at Duke University Medical Center has added to growing evidence that severe depression may be a biological disorder emanating from a specific part of the brain.
For some time psychiatrists have noted increased levels of the hormone cortisol in the blood of many depressed patients, but it was not known whether this indicated a malfunction of the adrenal glands, which produce cortisol, or of the pituitary gland that regulates them.
The Duke study, published in a recent issue of Science, suggests the problem is actually farther up the anatomical chain, in the hypothalamus. If confirmed, the discovery could ultimately have profound implications for treatment.

"It appears to be a cascade effect," said Dr. Charles B. Nemeroff, assistant professor of psychiatry and pharmacology at Duke. "By producing an excess of a peptide called corticotropin-releasing factor (CRF), the hypothalamus drives the pituitary, which in turn causes the adrenal glands to make cortisol."
Nemeroff's research group found that 11 of 23 depressed patients had higher CRF levels in their spinal fluid than the highest found in normal healthy patients. But the levels were not elevated in patients with schizophrenia or senile dementia, he said.

"Cortisol levels tend to normalize in patients who recover from depression," Nemeroff said. "We now want to see if CRF levels also normalize. If so, CRF may become a marker to help identify severe depression."
Managers report they are most productive before or after the usual business day.
