

Lack of local money costs CD application

By Ed Miller
Hoke County will lose points on its application for Community Development Block Grant funds because no local money was put into the project to revitalize the Tylertown area.

In a recent letter to Hoke County Commission Chairman John Balfour, a spokesperson for the North Carolina Department of Natural Resources and Community Development (NRCD) said local money put into any aspect of the primary revitalization project would make points for the application.

"In the specific case of Hoke County, any local funds, whether from the county or from a private source, used for activities which are part of the community revitalization project would generate points for the application," Alice Beddingfield Director of the NRCD Division of Community Assistance said in the letter.

"Any county or private funds used for 'local option' activities, such as street paving, which are not a part of the community revitalization project, would have no effect on the application's score or subsequent ranking," Beddingfield said in the letter.

In a recent meeting, the Hoke County Commission voted not to put any money into the revitalization plan.

Giving a hand
Marsha Hendrix (standing) helps a student use one of the computers at the Hoke County Education Center. The computers are used to teach reading at all grade levels 2-12.

Hendrix is offering computerized help

Marsha Hendrix is a whiz -- a computer whiz. Each day, she brings computer assisted learning to Adult Basic Education and GED students.

Marsha is the computer instructor in Hoke County for the Continuing Education Department at Sandhills Community College.

She joined the SCC staff in February when eight Apple computers were installed at the Hoke County Adult Education Center downtown.

She currently is teaching eight computer assisted Adult Education classes at the center. Four of these meet at the Center and the other four come in from other locations to use the computers.

Studies performed at Central Piedmont Community College, which has been using the computer to fight illiteracy for two years, show that students can progress faster in reading using the computer as a teaching tool. The program there has drawn national attention.

In Hoke County, the machines have proven to increase reading ability more quickly than conventional methods. The computers are currently being used at all grade levels from second - twelfth.

For more information, contact Marsha or any of the instructors at the SCC Hoke Education Center, or call 875-8589.

Getting ready for competition
Turlington students Toni Lewis, Robbin Caldwell, Allison Anders and Jerry Lupo prepare for state history competition.

Turlington pupils quizzed in state history contests

Four members of the J.W. Turlington Social Studies Club and the Tar Heel Junior Historian Association competed in the Christopher Crittenden State History Quiz.

The quiz was sponsored by the historian association.

The quizzes were sent to Raleigh to be graded.

The students will be notified by mail if they are winners in the contest.

The Social Studies Club has been an active member of the Tar Heel Junior Historian Association for three years.
