...Farms face economic woes

 single farmer to work more land.
 Obvious changes such as more powerful tractors and mechanical milkers have allowed farmers to spread their own labor over more acres or more output. We may now be entering an era in which informational advances will allow farmers to spread their own managerial talents even more broadly.

Advances in education and other human investments by farmers have been as dramatic as the technological revolution. This increase in human capital has three effects on farming.
 First, it makes a farmer more able to organize and manage a larger operation. Second, it allows a farmer to understand and use more sophisticated techniques, equipment and supplies.
 Finally, the more educated farmer has better opportunities off the farm. This implies that farming itself must be made relatively more attractive to draw and retain talented farmers.
 In general, this means that the farming operation will be larger to generate larger net returns per farmer.

The nonfarm economy has not remained static during the decades of change on the farm. Wage rates off the farm have advanced, farm hired labor wages have risen and, as mentioned above, the incomes of farmers themselves must compete with comparable off-farm occupations.
 A second nonfarm factor is the increased access to off-farm part-time jobs by farmers.
 The dual job-holding takes two basic forms. First, a "full-time" farmer takes a part-time job off the farm for a few weeks per year or a few days per week; or second, a full-time employee does "part-time" farming. In general, the off-farm work phenomenon has allowed for more variety in the size of farms.

A final set of factors affecting farm size and structure is government policies. The effects of commodity programs have been broad and diffuse, with little clear evidence that they alone have made farms bigger or smaller in general.
 Most programs have no real barriers to size and the benefits are usually proportional to sales.
 Tax policies are sometimes said to favor larger farms, but more careful analysis reveals a number of conflicting effects, with the net influence being either small or unclear.
 The one clear statement to be made with respect to government policies and farm size and structure is that claims that such policies have unquestionably made farms larger or smaller are mistaken.
