Exactly the right kind of container Many medicines lose potency when not stored in exactly the right sort of container. It is, therefore, never recommended to remove pills from their original containers, even for easier access later.

Some bottles must be impermeable to dampness or air, some must not admit certain types of wavelength light, while others must not absorb chemicals from other medications. Always keep each type medication separately in its own bottle, exactly as dispensed. Never combine different pills in common containers.

If your bottle is too bulky, ask for a smaller bottle. Your pharmacist strives to please!
