PLANT FALL SPUDS EARLY IN AUGUST

Expert Recommends Varieties of Potatoes For Fall Planting

When the month of July is dry and hot, the fall crop of Irish potatoes in the eastern and central parts of North Carolina should not be planted until August.

Some growers have found it advisable not to plant before August 15 when hot, dry weather continues late in the summer, said Robert Schmidt, associate horticulturist at State College.

Irish Cobler, Red Bliss and McCormick or Lookout Mountain are among the varieties recommended for fall planting. The McCormick gives heavy yields, but is not so palatable as the others.

The best planting seed is that held over in cold storage from the previous fall, Schmidt stated, but it is usually high priced and hard to obtain.

Seed from the spring crop may be used the following fall, but only if it has been given special treatment, he added, for the seed has not been mature long enough to germinate readily of its own accord.

A favorite method of treating the potatoes from the spring crop for planting is to spread them out in the shade where they will get plenty of light but not be in the direct rays of the sun. In four or five weeks they turn green, and when planted under proper moisture conditions they usually give a fair stand.

Or the potatoes may be treated chemically with thylene chlorhydrin. However, this method is not always successful in hot, dry weather, Schmidt observed.
