This Week IN WASHINGTON

Washington, Feb. 21.—The two important subjects which overshadow everything else in Washington are the President's work with Congress and the necessity for increasing national defense precautions.

There is little difference of opinion on Capitol Hill on the first of those; Congress, especially the Senate, is in a fighting mood and is defying the Presidential wishes.

There is considerable difference of opinion in Congress as to the real need of spending as much money as the Army and Navy, backed by the President, think should be spent for increasing the nation's armaments.

Without the backing of informed public opinion, even those who strongly favor heavy increases in armaments feel that it would be unwise to go too far. If the public knew the facts, these members of Congress believe, there would be no opposing sentiment against spending all that might be necessary on our fighting forces.

The facts about the military strength of America and the democracies of Europe, as compared with that of the dictatorships, which were told to the Senate and House Military Affairs committees, are beginning to leak out, and they are making a deep impression upon members who had not heard them and who were inclined to oppose the whole idea that the United States needed stronger defenses.

Craig Gives Figures
As outlined by General Malin Craig, Chief of Staff of the Army, the comparative figures are very interesting. Military men talk of armed forces in terms of Army divisions. A division is a completely self-contained fighting unit of, usually, 20,000 men and officers, equipped and manned to take the field alone if necessary.

The latest figures show that Germany has 90 such divisions, Italy 44, France 38, and England only seven, Japan has 50 army divisions in China, 12 more in Manchukuo and nine at home.

And the United States has only parts of four divisions. There are 400,000 soldiers on the War Department rolls, including the regular Army, the National Guard and the enlisted reserve; but they do not constitute an effective fighting force because they have not the equipment for war.

The Army has developed at the Springfield Arsenal a new type of infantry rifle which is said to be the best in the world, but there are only 8,000 of those modern rifles to equip the entire army.

There are only 140 of the three-inch field guns which are the main reliance of a mobile army; only two of the modern 105-millimeter guns upon which foreign armies are relying, and less than half the number of machine guns needed to equip what troops we could put in the field if necessary.

General Craig startled the Congressional committee by citing pages of such facts, and especially by alleging that most of the gunpowder the Army has now was left over from the World War and has deteriorated so that it explodes often by spontaneous combustion, sometimes blowing the gun-barrel to bits.

Inclined To Do Something
In the light of such information Congress is more inclined than before to put the nation's defenses into working shape, but is still inclined to be suspicious of being led into entangling foreign alliances.

The real battle between the President and Congress may have only begun. The Senate's refusal to confirm the appointment of Floyd H. Roberts to be a Federal Judge in Virginia, by a vote of 72 to 9, was the opening gun. The President's attack upon the ancient system of "Senatorial courtesy" under which no high official can be confirmed if he is personally obnoxious to the Senators from his home state, has opened up the whole question of the power of appointment.

The President insists that it is a power granted by the Constitution to the President alone. The Senate holds that the power of appointment is a dual function of President and Senate together.

Much re-reading of the Constitution is going on on Capitol Hill, and member are discovering that the Constitutional power of appointment granted to the Executive extends to Justices of the Supreme Court, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls.

He may also, still by and with the consent of the Senate, appoint other public officers whose selection is not otherwise provided for by law, but Congress is given specific authority to take the appointing power of minor officials out of the President's hands and vest it in the courts or in the heads of departments.

The appointment by the President of Thomas R. Amlie as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission greatly intensified the heat generated by the appointment of Judge Roberts. Several other Presidential appointees are likely to have rough sledding and more refusals of the Senate to confirm them are expected.

It all sums up that the President is mad at Congress and Congress is mad at the President. The President displayed his anger when he sent a demand to Congress for the restoration of the 150 million dollars which Congress had chopped off from the W. F. A. fund which he had requested. Congress slapped back at the President by voting, ten to one, to continue the Dies committee for investigating un-American activities, which the President disapproves.

The talk on Capitol Hill is that the two items in the departmental reorganization plan which the President most desires, the changing of the character of the Civil Service Commission and placing the Controller-General under the Executive instead of under Congress, may be cut out of the bills to make it easier for the machinery of government to function.
