

WHAT A HELP THEY WOULD BE
The bunch here at the office usually gathers in a group during the latter part of the lunch hour and discusses the European war, each giving an opinion on how he believes it will come out and whether or not this country will become involved.

All of them seem sure that sooner or later the United States will get mixed up in the bloody mess, and when they reach that point, they begin to talk about the particular branch of the service in which they would like to serve.

Albert Glover, the linotype operator, figures the ideal spot for him will be in the coast artillery, where he will be able to shoot big guns and sink enemy submarines off our coast. Of course we want to give the boy credit, but if we were commander of an enemy sub in these waters and knew Albert was on the business end of a big gun, we'd figure we'd be absolutely safe in direct range.

Then there's Ott Laffoon, who may always be found on the business end of a big monkey wrench here at the office. He would like to join the artillery, but imagine the embarrassment it would cause when an order came through to lay down a barrage to find Ott had taken his big gun all to pieces so he could fix it.
