Missionaries Tell of Their Life in China

roared overhead and bombs dropped from the sky to explode within a short distance of their home, but they warned that they could tell nothing of the Japanese army or its equipment, because they had been required to sign a paper pledging secrecy before they were allowed to leave China. Violation of that pledge would mean they would not be able to return.

When Japan began its invasion of China the Lawtons were at Kuling, a famous resort town located upon a mountain top. At Kuling, the Lawtons said, are the part-time homes of many high Chinese, including the president of China, Lin Shen, and the commander of the Chinese army, General Chiang Kai-Shek. Madam Kai-Shek frequently attended church there, always being accompanied by six secret service men, they said.

When the Japs attempted to take Kuling, the American Consul attempted to get all foreigners to leave the resort in fear of bombing raids. Many left, but the Lawtons stayed on, an American flag painted on their roof their only protection.

The Japs surrounded the town and bombed it repeatedly. During one raid, in which five planes appeared over the city, a bomb struck within 72 feet of where Mr. Lawton was standing. He said he had been needing some loose dirt for some time with which to level off his yard, and the explosion served admirably in providing a source of supply.

One day, they said, they stood in the doorway of their home and watched the Japanese drop incendiary bombs upon a settlement located on an opposite hill.

Luckily not a bomb hit its mark.

During air raids Chinese would flock to the American Mission, feeling that the stars and stripes would protect them.

When the Japs eventually occupied the town, getting a pass to leave the resort was difficult, the Lawtons said, it being necessary to have their pictures taken and to carry it with them. The Japs were polite to them, they said, but were harsh with the Chinese.

When they left Kuling to begin their trip to the United States, the Lawtons traveled from Kuling to KiuKiang by chair borne upon the shoulders of four men, then resumed their journey by truck to the Yangtze river where they boarded a Japanese transport for Shanghai. Eventually reaching Kobi, Japan, they sailed for the United States on the President Pierce.

Three children, two sons and a daughter, and several grandchildren, are still in China, the Lawtons said. They mentioned in passing that the President Pierce was the same ship in which Rev. Mr. Whisenhunt sailed for China when he went there to take up his work as a missionary.

Plans for the immediate future have not been definitely decided, they said.
