WONDERS HOW WAR WILL END

Former German Kaiser, on 81st Birthday, Ponders European Conflict

HAS KIN IN NAZI ARMY

Doorn, The Netherlands — On his 81st birthday, Germany's former Kaiser, Wilhelm II, pondered in lonely exile how another European war will end.

Many of the congratulatory letters reaching the ex-Kaiser had been opened by German censors.

Only by special permit of Nazi authorities can he telephone members of his family in Germany. There have been unverified rumors of foreign agents keeping a close watch on him.

(The Dutch like to tell this story:

(A Nazi boasted to a Dutchman: "You'd better look out. Hitler may be here in Holland in a few weeks."

(The Dutchman replied laconically: "That right. We have the Kaiser here now.")

Unlike the birthday celebration last year, when the Kaiser's children and grandchildren and their families came to Doorn, there were no guests from outside the Netherlands.

Grey and aging but in fairly good health, the ex-Kaiser with his wife, the Princess Hermine, planned a quiet day. There was luncheon for members of his court and a few residents of Doorn, including Mayor Baron von Nagell.

The reclus of Doorn castle presents a sharp contrast to the militant figure of the war of 1914-18. But he maintains the formalities of court and follows keenly the news from the war fronts and the various capitals.

Forbidden, as the guest of the neutral Netherlands, to make any statements of a political nature, Wilhelm guards his thoughts about the present European conflict.

But he has a compelling personal interest in Fuehrer Hitler's German army, in which 22 of his grandsons are serving. One, Prince Oscar, lost his life in the Polish campaign.

As he places flagged pins in war maps after listening to foreign news broadcasts and studying newspaper reports, Wilhelm keeps to himself whatever hopes he may have for restoration of the Hohenzollerns.

It is known, however, that Prince Louis Ferdinand is his favorite grandson, and the next in succession after him would be this Prince's infant son.

Wilhelm took a stroll today in the garden after supervising last night his annual distribution of wood and foodstuffs to the poor of Doorn.

daughter and granddaughter stand next in line for it.

No doubt other generations will look upon this lovely example of early American craft, marveling at Henrietta's patience, and agree wholeheartedly with the poet Keats, who once wrote, "A thing of beauty is a joy forever."

BEDSPREAD HAS STIRRING PAST

Was Made in 1776 While Clouds of War Were Brewing Over Colonies

Germantown—In 1776 Henrietta Brown sat on her father's plantation near Lunenburg, Va., and made a bed spread.

Some 125 miles away in the capitol of Williamsburg trouble was brewing. Lord Dunmore, the last of the royal governors, had fled to England, and Patrick Henry, the fiery-tongued patriot, had taken his place in the governor's mansion. But Henrietta was too busy to be disturbed by the rumors of war for she was making pretty things for her hope chest. Later she married George Bucknall, who came from England bringing with him a chest of fine linens to sell to the colonial housewives.

Mrs. L. M. McKenzie, Sr., of this community, still has this same spread that was made so many, many years ago by her grandmother.

This spread is made from three widths of creamy homespun and is beautifully embroidered in an intricate pattern. In the center is an urn done in drawn-work that holds a bouquet of flowers and leaves. Surrounding this is a grape vine and bunches of grapes done in ribbon stitch with the grape leaves of punch-work. In the bottom corners are bunches of flowers tied with bows. With the exception of a small spray at the top of the spread the design is continuous. There are so many different kinds of work on it that Mrs. McKenzie, who is skilled with a needle herself, doesn't know the names of all of them. Fringe once edged this heirloom but that was removed by a previous owner.

To one who has never seen the spread, the question might arise: Isn't the design confusing with so many different parts to it, especially when it is executed in so many different stitches? But quite the contrary is true. There is a strong feeling of unity and rhythm in the design.

Mrs. McKenzie inherited the spread from her mother; her
