National Wild Life Week Is Being Observed

Observance of National Wildlife Restoration Week, March 17-23, helps to bring about a fuller understanding of what farmers are doing toward restoring wildlife resources in this section, according to County Agent R. R. Smithwick and J. E. Trevathan, Surry Work Unit Conservationist of the Soil Conservation Service in the Tri-Creek Soil Conservation District near Dobson, N. C.

The observance comes at a time when many farmers, as a part of definite conservation plans for their farms, are busy developing desirable wildlife areas by planting two or more rows of shrubs to provide food and cover for wildlife where newly planted woodland adjoins fields, roads, or pastures. Along the edges of fields next to the shrub borders, strips will be broken for planting of Lespedeza sericea, which will serve as turn rows, central erosion at the ends of rows, and supply a quantity of food and cover where it is needed most.

In gullies where farm plans provided for mulching with pine boughs during the past summer or fall, Lespedeza sericea will be seeded this spring to furnish food and cover in these areas. Several farmers already have seed on hand for this purpose. Mr. Trevathan says. These practices, which are first of all soil conservation measures, he points out, will provide shelter and abundant food for farm wildlife as a byproduct.

Through such programs, which are a part of individual conservation farm plans, Wildlife Restoration Week, which might otherwise be considered as something related to far away places, is brought directly home to the farms of this immediate section.
