Greater Buying Power For The Farmer's Dollar

Three developments of interest to the American farmer are reported in a review of the natural nitrate industry which has just been published by the Chilean Nitrate Educational Bureau. These developments, affecting the price of natural nitrate, its mechanical condition, and the bags in which it is sold, show, among other things, considerable increase in today's buying power of the farmer's dollar.

Turn back the calendar to 1927. That year new and more economical mining and refining methods went into operation. Price reductions followed. Today the price of natural nitrate of soda is about $20 per ton less than in 1927.

Mechanical condition has steadily improved. Today farmers everywhere are familiar with the famous natural nitrate pellets which are so easily applied and which resist the hardening and cake to which other nitrogen fertilizers are subject. The improved form of this hundred-year-old product retains, of course, the natural balance of many plant food elements besides nitrate.

Thirdly, in a large-scale effort to assist in developing new uses for American cotton, natural nitrate of soda was offered in even-weight cotton bags. Today farmers can have their natural nitrate delivered either in cotton or bur-lap bags, as preferred, at no difference in price.
