

LONDON DIGS IN FOR THE WINTER

Britain's War Leaders Believe Peril of Invasion Is Checked

UNDERGROUND HOUSING

Although King George has again warned his people that German armies for invasion of England are "massed across the channel, only 20 miles from our shores," Britain's war leadership is already counting that peril checked for the winter. It is preparing instead for a campaign of relentless bombing through long winter nights in a war-of-nerves even more intense than British citizens have yet known.

Plans to house an additional million Londoners underground at night are significant. They represent rising British confidence that the first defensive phase of Britain's fight for life has been won. The "crux" of the great air battle, as defined by British leaders, is daylight mastery of the air over England.

The Royal Air Force still dominates the air in daylight. That is the opinion of American military experts who have been making a realistic appraisal of the results of the German bombing attacks. They share British opinion that an attempt at a Nazi invasion would be foolhardy and probably disastrous as long as the R. A. F. has daylight command of the skies.

It is notable that the king's broadcast of encouragement to his people came as England turned the autumnal equinox corner. Day by day and week by week the invasion peril will lessen for England from now until winter passes. But for the next three months English nights will be progressively longer and more fraught with terror for the people of London and other English cities.

Carefully compiled British weather charts afford Londoners and the people of the cities on England's great midland plain little prospect of any long respite from night bombing raids. A day or two at a time, when gales blow and low temperatures at high flying altitudes restrict air warfare, is all that can be expected.

The next four months are the wettest of the year for England's north sea and channel coasts, and for the London area. Through October, November and December there is an average rainfall of from four to six inches a month and the downpour reaches a peak in January.

Night bombing thus will take on new terrors for people who may be forced to flee their homes in the rain and cold. Even with the invasion danger eased, the greatest strain yet placed on British nerves may come during the autumn and winter months.

SURRY COUNTY HOME BARN IS DESTROYED

A fire loss estimated at $9,000 was the result of a blaze Tuesday morning which destroyed a barn at the Surry county home, near Dobson. The barn was built in October of last year under a WPA project. For a time the blaze threatened the county home building, but the danger was overcome by Mount Airy firemen, who were called to the scene.
