

This Week IN WASHINGTON

Washington, Nov. 19—To all intents and purposes Franklin D. Roosevelt's third term as President of the United States has already begun. His inauguration on January 20th will be a mere formality, for he will have an even larger majority of supporters in the House of Representatives, and about as good a working majority in the Senate as he had had for the past two years.

Therefore the expectation here is that the course and policies which the Administration has been pursuing will continue unchanged, except that in some matters of international understandings the President will feel more free to act, since no election complications will arise from anything he does.

It is probable that some changes may be made in the Cabinet. The usual custom is for each member of the Cabinet to submit his resignation when a President succeeds himself, and he may or may not be reappointed.

Secretary Ickes of the Interior Department was the first to tender his resignation as of Jan. 20. The expectation is that one of the changes will be in the Department of Labor. Whether Secretary Stimson will remain at the head of the War Department is doubtful. The current gossip is that Mr. Roosevelt is making passes in the direction of Louis Johnson, who was assistant secretary of war under Mr. Woodring, and resigned after Mr. Woodring was forced out.

Strong Opposition
The major change in the Washington picture, however, as most observers see it, is the fact that for the first time since Mr. Roosevelt took office there is a strong opposition, whose existence cannot be overlooked, under leadership which has proved its power to lead. That Mr. Willkie will work with the Administration to further every essential measure of national defense goes without saying. There is no apparent ground, however, for talk about his becoming a part of the Administration. He would sacrifice the leadership which his almost-successful opposing candidacy conferred upon him and become a yes-man instead of the head of the opposition party.

How close the election was is being realized as the figures are studied by statistical analysts. A change of one vote in a hundred in ten critical states, or a total of less than half a million votes out of 50 million, would have put Mr. Willkie in the White House. Realization of this fact, and contemplation of the election map which shows the solid block of trans-Mississippi farm states in the Republican column, is considered here as likely to have a distinctly conservative influence upon domestic policies.

The important policies, however, are those relating to international affairs. The determination to give every possible aid to the British short of sending our fighting forces overseas has been strengthened by the result of the election. Those closest to the inside of State Department minds look to see an early break in diplomatic relations between this country and Germany, and some measure of defiance of Germany's efforts to keep our ships off the seas in the belligerent zone, such as was shown by President Wilson in the two years of American neutrality before we entered the first World War.

Resentment
Considerable resentment is felt over Germany's refusal to guarantee safe passage to an American ship to bring some 1,200 American citizens from the British Isles, though Italy agreed not to molest such a ship. It was incidents like that which finally brought the United States into the war in 1917.

There is no slightest sign of hesitation, now, in official encouragement of the supplying of arms, munitions, planes and ships to the British. The expectation is that perhaps 20, maybe more, of our biggest and best fighting planes, the famous "flying fortresses," will be on their way across the Atlantic before Christmas. The British government is buying all the available merchant shipping in this country which our Navy does not want, and has placed orders for 120 new cargo ships to be built in American shipyards as speedily as possible.

In the meantime, the United States Government itself faces the problem of finding a great deal more money, by borrowing or by taxation or both, than the present statutes provide for. When Secretary Morgenthau of the Treasury said a couple of days after election "We have only just begun to rearm," he said a mouthful. To carry out the defense program already started and generally agreed upon will call, Mr. Morgenthau said, for an increase in the national debt to at least 60 billion dollars and perhaps even more.

Fisherman's Luck
A fisherman caught the biggest pike he had ever handled and was so elated he wired his wife: "I got one that weighs seven pounds. It's a beauty."

Her answer: "I've got one that weighs nine pounds. Not a beauty—looks like you. Come home."

Some Flatterer
Interne: "You certainly have acute appendicitis."
Patient in New Building: "Oh doctor, you flatter me."
