No Black Market For Babies In N. C.

Strong state laws and good agencies for adoption have prevented the buying and selling of babies born to unwed mothers in North Carolina, Miss Harriet L. Tynes said today.

"Based on my years of familiarity with the situation," said Miss Tynes, who is executive director of the Children's Home Society of North Carolina, "I'm confident there is no identifiable black market in our state such as was described recently in Washington before a U. S. Senate subcommittee."

Legislative vigilance and continued public support for proper public and private adoptive agencies can help keep the state free of such a menace to children who need adoption and couples who wish a child, she added.

"Our state does not permit a couple to walk up the courthouse steps without a baby and out a side door with the adoption legally completed, as is possible in some states which have had the problem of black market traffic in babies," Miss Tynes said. "At least 12 months, in some cases, longer, is required to complete an adoption. This fact alone discourages those who would want to risk the payment of a large sum of money in return for a baby of doubtful origin and still more uncertain future."

As a further safeguard, no child can be adopted in North Carolina without a study of the child and the adoptive home and a report back to the court by an appropriate agency.

"Public concern is the best protection," Miss Tynes said. "If people care, and express their interest through support of appropriate agencies, we can help these children for whom adoption offer the best hope for the future."

The Children's Home Society has helped more than 8,000 children toward adoptions in its 62 years of operation. Its support is entirely voluntary, including participation in the United Fund campaigns of a number of Tar Heel communities. Its services are available statewide without charge through its offices or resident teachers in Greensboro, Charlotte, Wilmington, Greenville, Asheville, and Chapel Hill.

If you are wise, laugh.

A FIBER FIRST

Sheer blouse and lingerie fabrics, and silk-like dress fabrics, once beyond the realm of acrylic fibers will soon be available. The first continuous filament acrylic yarns are being produced by American Cyanamid in Creston, the Company's acrylic fiber.

DESIGN BREAKTHROUGH

Some of the new electric refrigerator-freezers have a brand new "furniture look" called "console" or "breakfront" models. They have a countertop for food preparation between the upper refrigerator section and the freezer section below.
