Poultry Needs Special Care

By Snoddy E. Wilson
Agricultural Extension Agent

High temperatures can reduce the profit from a poultry house. Steps should be taken to make broilers, table hens, breeder hens, and turkeys as comfortable as possible in hot weather.

Here are some things to consider in managing poultry on hot, humid days:

1. The normal body temperature of a hen is around 106 to 107 F. Birds have no sweat glands. High temperatures may cause heat prostration and high mortality.

2. High humidity causes the birds to suffer more during high temperatures. During periods of high humidity, more air movement is needed to remove the moisture given off by the bird's body. Fans that blow directly over the birds will quickly take away body heat and moisture to make them more comfortable on hot days.

3. Hot weather decreases appetites and increases the need for water. Birds may drink four to five pounds of water for each one pound of feed they eat.

Linda Carter has been a 4-H club member for nine years. She was the state Clothing Winner in 1968 and attended the National 4-H Congress in Chicago. She has participated in sewing demonstrations and in Career Exploration Activities as well as numerous other 4-H projects and events. In August, 1968, Linda will be the North Carolina delegate to the Tennessee State 4-H Club Round Up.

Both girls have been Key Award Winners and have served a term as president of the Duplin County 4-H Council.
