Library Tidbits

from J.D. Archibald

A CARE FOR NATURE written and illustrated by Henry B. Kane is the true story of one family's sympathy for and understanding of nature as it was observed in their own back yard. The author feels that nature is full of wonders and an eye not blind to nature finds beauty in all, even the smallest things. He laments the pollution and destruction of nature that has taken place in our country and contends that "if the woods and fields and streams are as well loved as one's own home, there is no inclination to befool them than there is to throw trash on one's living-room floor."

The author tells of his home in Lincoln, Mass., of his garden and huge backyard. The kitchen table and back porch become ideal observation posts for the enjoyment and study of insects, different types of birds and all types of animals (squirrels, mice, chipmunks, rabbits, etc.). The family built bird feeders enabled them to observe the migrating habits of the birds. Spring became the "Crazy Season," with mad pursuits of blue jays, robbers' battles, and pheasants' cockfights. The author writes in a warm, charming style and illustrates his text with his own drawings from his observations. The purpose of the book is found in the author's words "if these pages open the eyes of even a few readers to the great variety of life in their own back yards, then this book will have its intended purpose. With the swiftness of a flash it comes a new understanding and awareness, a sympathy for the natural world, a care for nature. This is the basis, the very foundation upon which depend many cures for the environmental ills that beset us. When that sympathy becomes widespread, miracles can be accomplished.

Once the art of living cheap but good belonged only to students, Bohemians and young couples who were more in love than in money. But, with the constant spiraling economy, the pleasures of a cheap but good existence are desirable by even the wealthiest of individuals. Thus, Martin Periss has written a book on the subject: HOW TO LIVE CHEAP BUT GOOD. Periss, a young Harvard graduate who has practiced what he preaches, shows how with a little knowledge and a lot of ingenuity anyone in any income bracket can face the problems of everyday living and emerge triumphant. He deals with such topics as renting a home (furnished or unfurnished), space, utilities, and how to move with a minimum of expense and anguish. He considers the pros and cons of various methods—professional movers, renting a truck, or hiring students to do the moving for you (at a fraction of the cost of professionals). A chapter is devoted to cleaning, fixing and furnishing the house or apartment. The author gives practical hints on how to deal with cock-roaches, mice and other rodents (such pests as toads, frogs and cats will do an excellent job of keeping your home free of rodents). Floor treatments, furniture repairs, do-it-yourself furnishings such as lamps, curtains, drapes and bedspreads are discussed. The book also tells how to shop, cook and eat like a gourmet on a limited budget. Mr. Periss gives us a book practical in all aspects of living. His language is amusing and is witty, humorous cartoons illustrate the text.

Mr. and Mrs. Zapp also have a son, Dr. H. Roland Zapp who is presently employed in research for the U.S. Defense Dept. on the Pacific Island of Kwajalein, Marshall Islands.

Accent on Agriculture

BY B. C. MANGUM

New Generation Of Farmers

Aside from the things one reads and hears about young people today, some young people are talked about for other reasons. The young farmer of this generation may or may not have a high school diploma or degree from a college or university. However, he may very well be an excellent businessman and organizational worker. He may even have that college degree as many do today.

Today's average young farmer was probably born after WW II. He grew up in a time when his parents could provide more of the necessities of life and even a few of the luxuries. As this young farmer reached adulthood, he may have worked away from home or on the farm. He could earn money for his own use to buy a car or other items he wanted. Now that he has begun his farming operation, he has developed into a "penny-wise" farmer who knows he must use some money with what he invests in his farm enterprises.

In fact, he is just like any other businessman. He expects to earn a reasonable return for the high investment in equipment and labor he has to make to farm. And, he will probably do it because of his determination.

Many of these young farmers are involved in local community activities as well as farm and farm-related organizations. More and more of these young people are taking leadership roles in their farm organizations. They are aggressive and want to work for the betterment of other farmers and their community.

It is these young people who constitute what has often been referred to as a "new breed of farmer". They are ready, willing and able to do their share in making a better tomorrow for all. We salute them!

The Right to Reading Readiness Workshop held at The State Library in Raleigh. The 3 day workshop consisted of speeches, discussions concerning projects presently underway in parts of N.C., demonstration of a successful story hour program and an evaluation dialogue.

Dr. Reuben Burton, the keynote speaker, and Deputy Director of the National Right to Read Program stated in the 4 years of this program, N.C. is positively moving in eliminating functional illiteracy among adults. Various innovative approaches to this problem were enumerated in allowing all adults the chance to be able to read basic materials encountered in everyday life.

Other speakers followed by discussions showed that the multi-media approach to reading for pre-school youngsters has helped these children to be better prepared in basic learning skills. Public libraries have been, are, and will continue to be a major force in preparing children for a successful future.
