Good Seed Week

Farmers and gardeners will be making some important decisions within the next few weeks — decisions that will go a long way in determining if they start the crop season out right or if they start it out with a strike against them.

"The decision on seed selection is one of the most important farmers and gardeners make," says Phil Denlinger, Duplin County assistant agricultural extension agent. "Good seed is readily available and they represent a relatively small portion of the total cost of a crop."

Trying to cut costs by buying cheap seed is false economy. Buying the best seed, even if it costs a little more, nearly always is the wiser investment, Denlinger adds.

A statewide emphasis on quality seed for farm and garden is underway as part of the program centered around "Good Seed Week," the first week of spring, March 20-26.

North Carolinians buy large quantities of seed each year as farmers plant millions of acres of crops and Tar Heel gardeners, among the most avid home vegetable gardeners in the country, tend their food-producing plots.

Poor quality seeds — those with low germination rates or with weed seeds — find their way to market year after year. The best way to avoid poor seeds is to check the blue tag attached to each container of certified seed. These seeds have been tested for germination and purity. The seed tag will have the following information: Kind & Variety: This is simply concerned with the species of plant such as tomato, pepper or corn. It may or may not state the variety name. If it does, the hybrid name is acceptable.

Pure Seed: This is based on the percentage of total weight of the kind and variety as stated on the bag. If more than one kind and variety is named, percentage of each component must be stated. Generally, farmers choose seeds with a high pure seed percentage (98% or more) of one kind and variety.

Germination: The percentage of pure seeds that germinated in a standard test is printed on the analysis tag. This percentage is based on a number of seeds that produce normal seedlings. A normal seedling is one that has the seed structure necessary for survival. Growers should remember that germination percentage is based on pure seeds and not on the total content of the bag. Most farmers desire seeds that are high (80 percent or higher in germination).

Other Crop Seeds: This includes the percentage of crop seeds other than the kind and variety listed. In the field, other crop plants may be as troublesome as weedy plants. Corn in soybean seed is an example.

Weed Seed: Presence of weed seed is expressed in percentage of total weight. This classification includes seeds, bulblets or tubers of plants recognized by official regulations or general usage as common weeds. High quality seeds should contain none or very low percentage of weed seeds.

Noxious Weed Seeds: Noxious weeds are plants that are extremely difficult to control by normal cultural practices. The name and number of noxious weed seeds, bulblets or tubers per pound must be printed on the analysis tag.

"Set some quality standards before buying seeds," Denlinger suggests. "To determine if the seeds you want to buy meet these standards, read and use the information on the seed analysis tag."
