Sweet Potato Weevil

Be on the lookout for the dreaded sweet potato weevil in your gardens and fields this growing season.

According to Phil Denlinger, assistant Extension agent, it is the most destructive insect pest of sweet potatoes in the U.S. The weevil is about the size of an ant, has a reddish-orange mid-section and legs, and a bluish-black head and abdomen. It also has a long snout.

The weevil was first seen in North Carolina in 1967 and 1971, but with quick action it was eliminated in 1972. It has been reintroduced in 1981 and was spotted in 11 different places last year. It is the time to take action. If you see this insect, contact the Agricultural Extension Service or the N.C. Department of Agriculture.

Use certified seed and do not bring in seed, cuttings, root or soil boxes from areas south of North Carolina. Many of the other southern states are already infested with the weevil. Don't make their problem our problem. Rotate your fields and gardens so you don't plant sweet potatoes in the same spot two years in a row. Destroy plants and potatoes in the seed bed after planting. Harvest the crop cleanly and destroy all crop debris, especially culls.

North Carolina is #1 in sweet potato production. By keeping the sweet potato weevil out, we can continue to be number one. Remember, keep North Carolina weevil-free in 1983.
