To control weeds in tobacco, you have to make two difficult decisions.

1. Should I treat for nutsedge? Nutsedge has been called the world's worst weed with good reason. Spreading by seed and by tuber, above ground and below, nutsedge can reduce tobacco yields, lower crop quality and increase harvesting costs. Even one tuber per square foot can escalate into a major infestation in just 20 weeks. So if you think you'll get nutsedge this year, you should seriously consider applying a preplant herbicide that can control it.
2. Should I treat preplant? If nutsedge might be a problem, the only time to get effective control is preplant. So you can decide to apply your herbicide early. But if you have problem weeds that don't include nutsedge, you could decide to apply your herbicide at layby or transplant instead. Not only will a single application last through the growing season, but you'll run less risk of injuring young plants.

And one easy one.

1. Which herbicide should I use? Choosing application time is the hard part. Choosing the herbicide is easy. Devrinol® selective herbicide. Preplant, Devrinol can be mixed with Tillam® to control both yellow and purple nutsedge, along with many other grasses and broadleaves. And if layby or transplant is your decision, Devrinol can save you up to 50% in herbicide costs. Devrinol may not remove the entire load of decision making from you, but it can help simplify it. Follow label directions. Stauffer Chemical Company, Agricultural Chemical Division, Westport, CT 06881.
