To one who Would be Buried on His Mountain Top. By Barbara Peattie Erskine

(The following poem was inspired by the remark of Mr Ludlum's printed recently in the Bee, that he would like to be buried on White Oak Mountain. Ed.)

So you'll be buried on your mountain top

Amid your chestnuts and your gnarled old oaks?

But you'll not lie there surely, you will walk

Out to your rock-crowned ridges' end

And lizard like, lie gazing out and up

Riding in space.

Here falls your darkling mountain wall, and there

Blue swims in blue; and silence holds the world.

Silence holds all, the buzzards swinging low,

The trees, and you.

I'd like to meet you there, some blue clad eve.

One cannot talk with folk on mountain tops,

But oh, I'd like to hold that wordless speech

With one whose flesh has grown impalpable.

Gods, what a thing to do.

Slip husks, and be the mountains' self—

The gentians soul—

The sun that burns out on the valley's brink.

No, you will not lie still, I think.
