An Invocation in Literature.
In literature an invocation is an address at the beginning of a poem in which the author calls for the aid of some divinity, particularly of his muse.

"How do you do?" was a shoe dealer's greeting to a pair of bandits who walked into the store. They showed him how they do.—Detroit News.

Impatience Always Wrong.
Coolness, and absence of heat and haste, indicate fine qualities. A gentleman makes no noise, a lady is serene.—Emerson.

Real Wisdom.
Wisdom does not so much consist in knowledge of the ultimate; it consists in knowing what to do next.—Albert.

Significant Silence.
You never hear the man who is lucky saying anything about the proverbial luck of the fool.—Boston Transcript.

Fast Traveling.
Friend (to road-hog, as a picturesque hamlet appears in the distance)—"There's a pretty village—wasn't it?"
