

How to Keep "Kids" Off Street

When the Dadson family out in Vancouver, B. C., bought two cornets and a trombone for their three children—the eldest of whom was then but six—the neighbors viewed the musical project with decided skepticism.

"Father" Dadson, however, had ideas of his own, and the doubts of the neighbors worried him not one iota. He believed that children "run the streets" because there is nothing in the average home to hold their interest. He believed that with a definite something in the home it would be the home, and not the streets, that would see the most of his children. Further, he believed that music could supply that definite something. At least it was worth a trial.

The above picture, from the Conn Music Center files, goes far toward telling the rest of the story of the father's experiment.

His three children—Billy is now six, Howard is six and Momi is four—are now real musicians. Recently they and their instruments on a nationally known radio circuit, "just to see what it was like," they pronounced their act the feature of the bill. "Father" Dadson, however, is more interested in the fact that the act is the death of the street.

and quickly corrected it by quoting Tolstoy to the effect that, "The only art that is worth anything is that which comes of itself without effort." If his work becomes forced, he leaves it for a time and does something else.

Rowell is quiet and retiring and refuses to give any information that might sound boastful. He does not care for publicity or popularity, but wishes to work quietly and undisturbed.

One of the pictures which received much comment in New York was "The Brook in Early Spring." A cool, transparent stream is seen winding its way through the woods into a green meadow. The brook shines and sparkles with a gem-like gleam and one can almost inhale the fragrance of the budding trees.

The color he uses is that fine yellow-green tone that sings of the freshness of spring or a rose tint that hails the coming shades of eventide and over all is spread a soft, hazy atmosphere that envelops everything in its mysterious folds. To him the world is beautiful and he makes it beautiful to others—which is the secret of the spell his paintings cast over those who view them.

rest from the world's control as he watched evening touched all nature with its calm and silence, and saw the twilight as white as the dawn slowly close the iron doors of day. He had heard the stars as they sang their litanies in the choirs of Heaven, as they did when the shepherds followed them to lowly Bethlehem two thousand years ago.

Tryon, said Mr. Crook, stands unique among the towns and cities of North Carolina. Not as a manufacturing town but as a citadel of beauty and comfort and rest; a place where the mountain temples stand out in beauty around you and protect you from the cold blasts of winter; a place of beautiful homes built on hill sides and in quiet valleys. Tryon attracts its people from the Pineries of the north in winter and from the plain and the holly in summer, from the orient of the Atlantic to the occident of the Pacific. Tryon's identity is its people; in no place of its size in this country is there gathered together a company of people with greater variety of individuality, a place where those finer qualities of human nature are more charmingly brought together or where the purse strings of cordiality and welcome are loosened to the extent that you find them in Tryon. No one has visited Tryon for the past twenty-five years without the feeling of delight at its wilderness of mountain beauty or the murmuring sound of its hill side streams as they sing their mountain songs. The charm of Tryon has been told to the ends of the world. Tryon has had its story told in poetry, in music in song and in art. The camera has reflected its many beauties, but human experience has told of its beauty and its charm, which exceeds the range of speech or language.

Mr. Crook amused his audience very much by his quaint stories. He told of a corpse that was brought to the undertaker and when the daughter of the deceased saw it, its jaw had dropped down and she refused it burial, and the undertaker had to have it buried in the potter's field. As he was nailing up the casket he said to the corpse, "If you had kept your mouth shut you might have had a decent burial."

Then he told of a man who boasted of swimming across a river three times. A boy who had listened kept laughing. The man indignantly asked what he was laughing at and the boy said, "Why didn't he swim the river four times and then he would have been on the side where his clothes were."

One of the best stories told by

Mr. Crook was regarding a townsman who had cut a statue that had been placed in square in Spartanburg. The man was asked whose statue it was and he said "It was mine. I knew this as he had one dollar towards it. It was his, he told to illustrate the fact of our knowledge of our own history."

Time and space were too short for us to only mention the addresses. Mrs. G. H. Ford, president of the Lanier Chamber of Commerce, presented a history and paper on which had been in existence for years, and now had many members. She then attempted to induce the people in the Chamber to some free general information about the Chamber of Commerce. Mr. P. H. ...
