Shown above are leaves and plant of tobacco injured by 2,4-D weed killer. The leaves on the left developed after the grower used the same barrels for mixing blue mold spray that he had used last year for mixing 2,4-D. Note the peculiar-shaped leaves, ruffled margins, crooked midveins, and abnormal vein patters. The tobacco plant on the right developed after another grower used the same spray rig for applying blue mold spray that he had previously used to apply weed killer. He washed out the sprayer with soap and water before applying the blue mold spray, but enough 2,4-D remained to cause this injury. Howard R. Garris, plant pathologist for the State College Extension Service, recommends separate sprayers for 2,4-D.
