Haywood Counties Spray Urban, Rural Sections

COLLEGE STATION, Raleigh—A good example of rural urban cooperation for community betterment occurred in Haywood county recently when Waynesville and other towns were sprayed with 80,000 gallons of 2 per cent DDT solution for the control of flies and other insects, according to Wayne A. Corpening, county agent for the State College Extension Service.

Nine orchardmen of the area supplied large spraying outfits, together with operating crews, for the program, at no cost to the urban residents. The towns bought the DDT, and the Health Department and local civic clubs cooperated to conduct the project.

All outhouses, trees, houses, and outbuildings were sprayed. Chicken lots, hog pens, stables, garbage cans, and other likely breeding places of insects received special attention.

A policeman preceded each spraying unit to notify home owners that the sprayers were on the way, so that desired precautions could be taken. In all instances, home owners and other residents cooperated fully in the program.

Urban citizens are now being urged to spray the interiors of their homes, since the general spraying did not affect indoor areas. Also, a campaign to general residents to spray their premises is being conducted.

County Agent Corpening, who helped coordinate the project, said it was just one example of how rural and urban residents are working together for the advancement of the county along all lines.
