Chapter 25

CORBIN found his place well crowded when he returned. He looked about quickly, nodded when he noted in that sweeping glance that most of his friends were there. He noticed too that their faces were flushed, an indi-cation that they had been doing plenty of drinking in his absence. He had hoped for that and now he felt reassured for the success of his plot. There were some twenty men at the bar, and apother eight or ten sitting at the tables. Dan Caldwell was at the far end of the har with Nat De-vine, a burly rancher. Corbin stepped up to the bar, then when he turned around the expression on his face had changed. Devine eyed him, cir-cled around Caldwell and Hewitt, sauntered up to him.

"S'matter?" he asked, "Somethin wrong?"

Corbin nodded grimly.

"And how," he said. He turned his head. "Hoy, one o' you fellers near the door . . . close it, will yuh? Then all uv yuh come over here. I've got somethin' t' tell

A man arose from one of the tables, stepped to the door, slammed it shut, then he hitched up his pants and followed some other table sitters toward the bar. They formed an uneven semicircle around Corbin. A couple of them were flushed, others were red-eved and most of them were unsteady on their feet.

"You fellers all know me, Corbin began. "I ain't an angel and I don't pretend t' be one. Like you fellers. I like my liquer and I like my fun, when I know where t' draw the line." Nat Devine frowned.

"What are you talkin' about?" he demanded. "You just keep listenin' fr a minute." Corbin retorted, "and you'll find out. Thight I got wind o' the dirtiest trick I ever heard tell uv, and soon's I heard uv it, a-plenty uv it, too. Like I said

STRONG hands reached for it, "I s'ppose," he said evenly, "I something indistinct and came oughta tell you that Judge Scott, plunging forward again, his heavy and in a brief span of seconds Sheriff Loomis and me heard everything you told them other thirty men with grim-faced Dan Caldwell leading them stormed fellers. I gotta hand it t' you, out of the place, headed for the Gorbin. You're just about the out of the place, headed for the most c'nvincin' liar I ever heard Sheriff's office down the street. Corbin followed them out ... in Y'know, f'r a minute, while I was listenin' t' you, I f'rgot I was the another minute he came back. one you were lyin' about. "S'matter?" he asked. "You go with th'm," Corbin said quickly. Murphy ripped off his apron, slung it aside, came into your storeroom, opened the door a crack and heard the hull show. It was pretty good, on'y we knew you were lyin' and that kinda spolled it f'r us." swinging out from behind the bar. "It'll look better if I kinda tag along toward the end o things. Get it?"

Corbin turned slightly and his spattered Corbin's shirt-front eyes watched the door hopefully, and he stonged, looked down at eagerly . . . George was motion-less, silent, then Corbin suddenly jerked his head around. George "Yeah, sure. But s'pose someb'dy asks what b'come o' you? What'll I tell 'em?" jerked his head around. George

"Just say guick-like that I'm lockin' up the cash and that I'll grunted. "No use hopin' f'r somethin' that can't happen," he said gruff-ly. He holstered his gun, un-buckled his belt and took it off, be along d'rectly. But don't let th'm hold things up f'r me."

The pudgy bartender grinned turned on his heel and strode to the door. He opened it, tossed the significantly . . , and evilly.

"Right," he said and he went out, pulled the door shut behind him.

George stopped, picked up a chair cash drawer under the bar, opened it . . . the door creaked and he raised his head. He stared and slung it across the room, caught up another and swung it over his head, then whirling, sent hard for framed in the doorway it spinning over the bar. The long was a tall, lean figure in whose big right hand a Colt gleamed wall mirror behind the har and the double tier of whiskey bottles,
