How Do Birds, Animals, Fish Find Way Back Home?

Dr. William E. Fahy of the University of North Carolina Institute of Fisheries Research delivered a lecture to the marine ecology class at Chapel Hill last Friday. The lecture was concerned with factors in the navigation of birds and fish.

The golden plover each fall flies, nonstop, 2,000 miles across the Pacific Ocean from Alaska to Hawaii. The red salmon returns 4,000 miles from feeding grounds in the northern Pacific to the stream where it was spawned so that it, in turn, can spawn.

A pet dog returns home over hundreds of miles of unfamiliar terrain. People are in danger of thinking of the "direction sense" as commonplace because these events happen every day, Dr. Fahy says. Actually, it is one of the unsolved biological mysteries.

The successful survival of many animals depends now, as it has through geological time, on the ability to return home from frequently extensive wanderings in search of food, to reach nesting or spawning areas, and to reach feeding grounds.

To account for the "how" of lengthy bird or fish migrations many different theories have been advanced, Dr. Fahy reports.

It has been suggested that animals use the sun by day and the moon by night to navigate, or even the sound of the pounding surf along the ocean shore. Some believe that familiar landmarks are used as beacons along the route.

More elaborate possibilities have been put forth, such as the utilization of radar waves or ultra short-wave frequencies emitted by the sun and several of the stars. Still others consider that polarized light or magnetic fields of the earth serve the animal as guides.

Currently the role of the body hormones and sense of smell in fishes are being investigated as to the nature of their control over migration.

The detection of Coriolis force by the inner ear of fishes and birds offers one of the most promising theories to explain how these animals find their goals with such extreme accuracy, Dr. Fahy continues. The supposed relationship of inner ear to Coriolis force provides the animal with a built-in gyrocompass.

Such a theory allows the animal to locate itself by latitude as well as distance from the earth's surface and, most importantly, it provides a theoretical basis for the inheritance of a direction sense from parent to offspring, Dr. Fahy concludes.
