The House of the Week

Plan Includes Special Inner Sanctum for Dad

By JOHN O. B. WALLACE

Houses often are designed with the special needs of mother or the children in mind.

But what about Dad, the breadwinner?

It is not often that Dad has been given the special consideration he is due in a home. So, fathers and husbands, everywhere, meet Samuel Paul, a father and architect, who has designed an unusual, L-shaped house with a special area just for you.

Paul's design, designated X-2 in the House of the Week series, does not neglect the needs and interests of the rest of the family.

However, as the architect explains, "there are times when Dad wants peace and quiet." And with this in mind, Design X-2 includes a special room just for Dad.

Three Main Living Areas

Dad's special room, an artfully-designed inner sanctum, has been placed in the "quiet" area of this eight-room ranch house. Two other main areas of living have been incorporated in the plan — a "formal" area and an "informal" area.

In order to reach the special room, one must walk through the bedroom hall into a secondary hall, thence into Dad's inner sanctum.

Father's study is laid out with built-in shelving and a desk. It also has a retreat terrace which is reached by sliding doors. The terrace is enclosed with substantial fencing on two sides and by a stone wall in front.

The rest of the quiet area of the house consists of three bedrooms, one the master bedroom with private bath. The quiet area is separated from the informal area by the more formal dining room, living room and foyer.

A decorative buffet separates the foyer from the dining room and the living room has a raised hearth fireplace. Off the family room, in the informal area of the house, there is a large family terrace for summer living.

Cathedral ceilings, with exposed wooden beams, are designed for Dad's room, the master bedroom, the dining room and the living room. Conventional ceilings are used elsewhere.

Walls of Glass Panels Glass panels are used in Dad's room and the master bedroom, extending up from the built-in units to the cathedral ceiling.

The informal area of the house constitutes the family room, kitchen, laundry and an area next to the two-car garage for a workshop or hobby room. These elements are located in one integrated block so that the entire family can work and play together as desired.

As the architect envisions this area, "mother could be working in the kitchen, the children could enjoy their play in the family room, and Dad could be tinkering in his shop — all doing what they desire, but at the same time enjoying each other's company."

The entrance of the house is at the intersection of the two arms of the "L" and is reached by passing through a front garden. There is a central foyer with direct access to all areas.

The architect has created a pleasant ensemble of exterior materials. The exterior walls are of board and batten. The roof is of white marble chip. The low-pitched roof has a large overhang. There is a strong horizontal accent of stone in the front and extending around the retreat terrace.

The stone provides interesting relief to the front elevation. The sliding aluminum windows and the awning windows integrate with the wood and the stone to create the exterior ensemble.

Statistics

Design X-2 has eight rooms, including three bedrooms, plus a laundry room, a workshop or hobby room and two outdoor patios.
