Garden Time

By M. E. GARDNER

Daffodils and tulips give us much pleasure in early spring and are to be found in most of our gardens. The question is: should they be taken up every year; every second year; or every third year?

It is not necessary to lift daffodils every year but it is highly desirable that the bulbs be dug, divided, and replanted every third year. This gives them a better chance to grow and reproduce. If yours need to be moved, wait until the leaves begin to turn yellow before digging.

While the leaves are still green, they are manufacturing food and storing it in the bulbs for next year's flowers. They may be dug, divided and replanted immediately, or they may be dried and stored in a cool place and held for fall planting.

The tulip is somewhat different. Bulbs should be taken up and replanted every second year. The bulbs may deteriorate rather rapidly and for this reason it is sometimes best to buy fresh bulbs every year if large flowers are desired. If bulbs are to be replanted, do not dig them until the leaves turn yellow, as was the case with daffodils.

Bearded (German iris) is blooming now in our neighborhood and will be ready to divide and transplant in about a month. However, plants may be divided and transplanted any time during the summer and early fall. A good division consists of a new rhizome, or thickened underground stem, with a cluster, or fan, of leaves.

After the division has been made, the rhizome should be planted so that the top of it will be even with the soil. Deep planting is not desirable. Bearded iris do best in well drained soils which dry rather quickly.

Cool weather in the spring frequently interferes with fruit setting on tomato plants. This is particularly true of the first two or three flower clusters that are formed. Hormones, or plant regulators, applied to these first clusters may give you earlier tomatoes and more total production. They may be purchased from your seedsmen under the trade names of "Blossom Set" or "Fruiteone."

If you want to experiment, use one of these materials according to accompanying directions. Spray on the open blossoms with an atomizer or fine spray.
