

William K. Bell Speaks To Queen Street Pupils

William K. Bell, noted Negro economist and author, spoke Thursday to students of Queen Street high school on the necessity of Negroes to raise their economic levels.

It is Mr. Bell's contention that Negroes must support themselves, must operate successful small businesses, must strive to create successful large businesses, must learn not to depend weakly on emotionalism but compete honestly and self-reliantly with all other races.

Mr. Bell was born in Newport, N. C., March 8, 1892, of poor parents. His attention to his work in the Newport Negro school of those days, a school of only three months' duration a year, attracted the attention of several white families there, including the kin of Leon Mann Jr., the present mayor.

Mr. Bell attended St. Augustine College in Raleigh, then went to Howard University, Washington, D. C., and later did further work in economics at New York University. From 1923 until 1929 he was in the men's wear business in New York.

From 1929 on he concerned himself as writer and lecturer with a program to induce Negroes to learn to depend on themselves economically. His books are: A Business Primer for Negroes and 15 Million Negroes and 15 Billion Dollars.

The late Manly G. Mann Sr., general manager of Farmers' Co-operative Exchange, Raleigh, said of Business Primer:

"You certainly do deserve a lot of credit for all that you have accomplished in this world, and only those of us who know you as a very small boy appreciate the obstacles which you have overcome." Leon Mann Jr., of Newport, said.

"All in all I thought it a very good book and while it may not have far flung sales and make the Book-of-the-Month Club, we must remember that Christ at first had only 12 faithful men. In time to come I am sure your book will gain in importance. It offers not only excellent means of conducting a business, but a way of living."
