The House of the Week

Large, Massed Areas Help Reduce Cost in This Plan

You can build this smart ranch house without crippling the family budget. There are three bedrooms in a wing at the right. The dining-living room and the kitchen are at the back. Optional basement plans are offered — a full basement, partial basement or no basement.

This floor plan shows the room arrangement in either the full or partial basement versions. If no basement is wanted, the stairs and vestibule back of the kitchen become storage space and the washer and dryer move into the right rear corner of the kitchen area.

By JOHN O. B. WALLACE

You can save money at every turn in building this smartly-styled, three-bedroom ranch house because the architect has filled it with built-in economies.

The goal of Architect John S. Burrows Jr. in developing design X-23 for The House of the Week was to produce a house of the week for a family with moderate incomes who want sound planning and good styling in a house they can afford.

He made no sacrifices with styling or design, but he used what he calls "controlled measurement planning." This simply means that mass-produced building components can be used throughout the house, sharply cutting waste in materials as well as reducing labor costs.

Burrows, a man with wide experience in planning small home projects for U.S. government developments, is serving this month as an American delegate to the Congress of the International Federation of Housing and Planning in Liege, Belgium.

His design offers optional basement plans. There can be a full basement, a partial basement—or no basement.

Here are the full details of Design X-23 described area by area for an easy-to-see picture of the house:

Living Area The living and dining rooms occupy a large area at the right rear corner. The area is 20 feet across the back and 30 feet from back to front.

Set within this area are a fireplace and a guest closet. The dining room is reached through a swinging door from the adjacent kitchen.

Should the third bedroom be used as a den, its area may be linked with the dining and living rooms by opening a folding door. Or, at the owner's option, this folding door can be a permanent wall.

Full-height awning windows overlook the rear terrace from the dining-living room and a door opens directly onto the terrace from the dining-living area.

This section has three bedrooms and two baths, and a center hall.
