Raymond Duke, owner of Sportsman's Pier, sat on the end of his pier until Helene blew itself out early Sunday morning. This picture was taken on the pier about 3 p.m. Saturday with winds reported up to 80 m.p.h. Mr. Duke sat on the leeward side of the shelter on the pier. He said he "always wanted to sit out a hurricane."

This huge tree fell early Saturday afternoon, taking down power lines and blocking the 300 block of Orange Street, Beaufort.

This rear view of the boat shed shows the roof on the ground some 50 feet from the shed.

Parker Motors, along with several other Morehead City businesses, lost considerable amounts of plate glass. This picture shows the east side of the building.

The creosoted wood piling seawall constructed in front of these cottages at Money Island proved its worth during Helene. At no time during the storm did breakers go over the wall.

The Dainty Maid Bread Co. warehouse on the Atlantic Beach Causeway was leveled by the force of Helene's high winds. The large front doors blew open and the wind went through the cement block building, taking nearly everything with it.

Helene lowered the boom on this house on Cedar Street, Beaufort. The walls collapsed and the roof settled directly on the foundation.

This cement block wall at the west end of the Morehead City High School athletic field was flattened Saturday night.

This trailer, parked at Fort Macon Road and the Atlantic Beach Road, was blown over on its side.

Mr. and Mrs. Clayton Fulcher Jr. survey the damage to Mrs. Fulcher's pier at Cedar Island. A large percentage of Cedar Island was flooded during the storm.
