ASC Office Manager Tells Farmers to Turn in Cards

ASC office manager B. J. May reminds all tobacco and peanut growers that they are required by Program regulations to return their marketing cards to his office at the close of the marketing season.

Farmers who fail to turn in their cards are liable to have their allotments for next year reduced. Not only does the farmer suffer when he fails to turn in his card, the ASC office work is slowed down as well.

ent occupations. Educators have lived with this challenge for a good many years. In any one high school, on any one day, you can find teachers who are specialists in home economics, industrial and vocational arts, office practice, physics, history, and a host of other subjects.

Your school and the community as a whole have become the laboratory and proving ground for hundreds of exploratory activities leading to a career. In addition, many of the secondary schools provide guidance counselors, who are trained to recognize talent and to draw out and direct the best qualities of each individual student.

These people have only the objective in mind of helping each youngster evaluate the interests and skills he has developed through learning and experience and providing teachers and parents with useful information.

The modern teacher in a good school has access to hundreds of textbooks, pamphlets, magazines, and newspapers; special devices and machines; and audio-visual aids, including classroom television, recordings, and motion pictures.

In addition, there are many teachers who keep a "community resource file". This is a list of local people with special skills, occupations, and hobbies, who are invited to come to school and share their knowledge and experience with the class. This experiment has worked out very well in many places.

Bringing the community into the school is one way of enriching the learning process. Another is to take the students into the community. A visit to a factory, a court, or a newspaper, when properly supervised, is more than a break in school routine. It is an opportunity to begin to understand the function of significant segments of the community.

The teacher must select, organize, and give meaning to all these diverse factors, deftly relating them to the immediate environment and direct experience of all students. Preparing a curriculum takes hours of planning and thought. All units of work must be carried out in the tight span of about 180 days—the average school year.

The good teacher sees to it that every child has the opportunity for constructive experiences, which may go beyond the formal curriculum in a variety of ways. For example:

School clubs, committees, and discussion groups — with teacher advisors — help youngsters build self-confidence and poise.

Debating groups, public speaking contests, student governments, school - sponsored current affairs seminars, mock political conventions, safety patrols, and charity drives—directed by teachers—enable youth to make a habit of good citizenship.

Family management activities—guided by teachers—offer work-study experience in how to budget, buy and sell wisely, start businesses, care for infants, and decorate a home. All help sharpen a student's sense of practical and economic values.

Sports and other carefully controlled extra-curricular health activities — coached by teachers — demonstrate the value of fair play and the necessity of self-control.

Sometimes a pupil's personal or family conflicts go beyond anything which formal in-school counseling, committee, or club participation can resolve. When a youth shies away from the friendship of his classmates or feels that he is a failure, often it is the teacher who moves to solve the problem before it reaches serious proportions.

Then, there are behavior problems. The tendency to criticize the "younger generation" is as old as civilization itself. Twenty - three centuries ago, Socrates wrote: "Children are now tyrants. They no longer rise when elders enter the room. They contradict their parents, chatter before company, gobble up dainties at the table, cross their legs and tyrannize over their teachers."

Such "misbehavior", of itself, does not identify a juvenile delinquent or a major personality problem. However, the fact that the generations are often critical of each other should not be used to minimize the seriousness—or the extent—of juvenile problems.

Dry Pool

Fulton, Ky. (AP)—All was dry when the new swimming pool was dedicated. Not enough money was left after the pool was built to fence the area. Officials didn't want anyone falling into the pool — so the pool remained dry until a fence was built.
